There are seven or eight millions in this matter which, if the bill pass, will go to the insurance companies, which from the day when this matter was first spoken of have maintained able counsel here in Washington, in the committee-rooms and dogging the members at their residences. The money is enough so that this interest which always appears here never dies. It is always here. It employs counsel in the committees, and who have the right to come here on the floor to besiege the members at their desks. Our desks have been loaded with documents, arguments, and speeches by one man and another, kept up by this immense interest that is bound never to leave the American Congress until it wears it out and gets its claim through. Every Congress thus far has smitten this claim in the face, has denied it and defied it, and said that it had no right in equity or in law, but that the fund should be kept for the men who actually suffered loss. Now with all the investigations that have been had, with all the light which has been thrown upon the subject, I do not believe that even with all the persistent efforts of the insurance companies this House is prepared to go back upon its own record and reverse the principles of the act of 1874 and give this money to companies to whom it does not belong either in fairness or in law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Speaker, we have about $10,000,000 of the Geneva award fund to be yet distributed; not because we received too much money from Great Britain, but for other reasons which I will allude to hereafter. The question now is, shall this money be distributed by Congress; or will Congress shut its eyes to the merits of the various claimants and remit the whole subject to a court of law, leaving to that court alone the settlement of the conflicting rights and interests of the parties, if they have any?

The most plausible argument that can be addressed to the legislator or to the average American mind is a proposition to leave anything of a troublesome nature to the courts. We went so far in that direction recently as to submit to a so-called court the sovereign right of this House to count the electoral vote. For one, I had an experience upon that occasion which without good ground I am not willing to repeat. And I am not in favor of remitting to any judicial tribunal the duties that belong to us as legislators.

I do not believe in the proposition which underlies the argument of those gentlemen who openly plead for the insurance companies, or of those who plead for the majority bill without expressing an opinion upon the rights of anybody. Therefore, with the consent of the other members of the minority of the committee, I have drawn a substitute which is based upon an entirely different theory and, as I hope to show, upon a theory sanctioned by law and precedent and founded in common sense and natural justice.

The proposition made in favor of the insurance companies is that they have a claim, or rather I should say a right, legal or equitable, to this fund. And they ask to be allowed to go into court to assert it. Now, if I believed that anybody had such legal or equitable right I would be the last man to refuse this request. I am not in favor of confiscation. If the insurance companies have a legal or equitable right to any part of this fund I for one would not, under any circumstances, agree to cut off that right by any act or vote of mine.

I said that the insurance companies believe or claim that they have a legal or equitable right to this fund. And the gentlemen who advocate the majority bill as an impartial bill between the contending parties must advocate the proposition that some person or corporation has a right to this fund, because a proposition to refer to the courts must be a proposition to refer some title to the court which it can consider, and must involve something more than the enforcement of mere moral obligations. The bill of the majority, though seeming to be in the interests of neither class of claimants, is therefore based upon the theory of the insurance companies, that some rights exist enforceable in the ordinary courts of law.

It is because there is neither a legal nor an equitable right to this fund in any person or corporation that I believe, not only that it ought to be distributed by Congress, but that it must be so distributed.

The argument that certain rights exist in this fund and, permit me to say, with all due deference to the eminent gentleman by whom it was first made, the fundamental error of gentlemen speaking for the insurance companies or the majority bill, is that all national claims were excluded by the tribunal at Geneva by the order of June 22, 1872; and that after that order nothing was submitted to the tribunal except, in the expressive language of the present Secretary of State, "a bundle of private claims." This is the underlying argument of the insurance companies. It is the argument of the gentleman who will follow me in support of the majority bill; it cannot but be his argument. It was the argument of gentlemen who have preceded me. And upon this foundation rests the proposition that those whose claims seem to have been allowed there should be paid, and no others. And that all should be excluded here who were rejected at Geneva.

This is not true; and if the foundation of the argument is false, the argument must fall. The claims that were excluded at Geneva were the "indirect claims," not the "national claims." I ask gentlemen to read the order excluding them. That will be proof sufficient. Certain national and private claims were ruled out, not because they were national or private, but because they were "indirect," or consequential.

As conclusive proof of this assertion, I call attention to the award itself; because if national claims were excluded by any preliminary order of that tribunal, prior to its entering upon the investigation of the case, as only the "indirect" claims were, then we would find nothing in the award admitting or rejecting a national claim. But what is the fact? The record will show that after the unanimous order excluding indirect losses, the Government of the United States offered proof of its expenses in the pursuit of the various confederate cruisers. This was considered and passed upon in the final judgment, and if gentlemen will turn to the award which was rendered September 14, 1872, they will find that the tribunal gave the following opinion upon this question:

> And whereas, so far as relates to the particulars of the indemnity claimed by the United States, the costs of pursuit of the confederate cruisers are not, in the judgment of the tribunal, properly distinguishable from the general expenses of the war carried on by the United States,
> The tribunal is therefore of opinion, by a majority of three to two voices—
> That there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head.

This is conclusive proof that the unanimous judgment of the tribunal on the 22d of June, 1872, against indirect losses was only against them because of their indirect character and not because they were public claims. Therefore when the distinguished gentleman, now Secretary of State, said in his argument before one of the committees of a former House—which argument is so often repeated—that after the order referred to nothing was submitted to the tribunal at Geneva but a "bundle of private claims," he was presenting his case as a lawyer with a large present, a larger prospective fee. He was arguing his side of the case—not presenting an unbiased opinion—leaving to the committee and the House to decide the question. He never gave any such opinion, he never made any such statement while occupying an independent position; nor did he make it to the tribunal at Geneva when acting for the Government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, so far from it being true that "private claims" were submitted to the tribunal at Geneva as "private claims," I make the assertion, and I propose to support it by distinguished authority at home and abroad, that all that was submitted to the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva was a question between the two governments, all that was passed upon was the question between the two governments; and when private claims were presented they were brought forward in the attitude of witnesses, and witnesses only, as to the extent of the injuries suffered by the American Government; not as the claims of individuals prosecuted either by themselves in person or by their attorney, or by their trustee or agent, the United States Government, as some gentlemen claim.

This whole question lies within the narrowest compass. Did our Government in the treaty stipulate for the payment of the claims of individuals as private claims, or did it stipulate for the settlement of a question of a public character? Did the tribunal at Geneva award upon private claims, or did it award to the nation? If these claims were presented at Geneva as private claims on behalf of individuals and were awarded to the United States for the benefit of these citizens, and no others, the case would come within the precedents cited in the majority report, to which I expect to refer more at length in the course of my argument.

Mr. Speaker, when I affirm that no private claims were submitted, as such, to the tribunal at Geneva, I do not wish this proposition to stand upon the authority of my opinion, for that would have no weight. I desire to call the attention of the House to various public documents containing the history of this transaction, with some other persuasive proof. I read first, from volume 6 of the papers relating to the Geneva award, the instructions which Mr. Secretary Fish gave to General Schenck and the other commissioners selected by the Government of the United States to frame the treaty of Washington, and under which they acted in agreeing to the same. He says, page 275:

> You will receive herewith a confidential memorandum or brief embodying a reference to correspondence of this Department and to the history of several of the questions which may be discussed by the commission: First, the fisheries; second, the navigation of the Saint Lawrence; third, reciprocal trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada; fourth, the northwest water boundary on the strait of San Juan; fifth, the claims of the United States against Great Britain on account of acts committed by rebel cruisers; sixth, claims of British subjects against the United States for losses and injuries arising out of acts committed during the recent civil war of the United States.

Observe the difference between sections 5 and 6. The Alabama claims are spoken of in section 5 as "claims of the United States," not as claims of the United States and citizens thereof, or claims of citizens of the United States, but exclusively as "claims of the United States." But when private claims are spoken of in the following paragraph they are alluded to as claims of "subjects of Great Britain," and not as claims of Great Britain.

Men who engage in the highest offices of government, such as negotiating treaties between sovereign powers, which are always open to the closest scrutiny and narrowest construction that interest may dictate, and in reference to which extreme care in the use of language is of the greatest importance, because out of a varying construction may come that great calamity, war—I say that men who exercise these great offices always study in the closest manner the exact meaning of words and use them with the greatest circumspection.

In the framing of the treaty itself the same care was observed in distinguishing the Alabama claims from private claims. A comparison of article 1 of the treaty of Washington with article 12 will make the distinction most apparent. When the treaty speaks in article 1 of the claims of one government against the other, it uses language which specifically covers the claim of one government against another. But when in article 12 it treats of the settlement of private claims, it uses no doubtful words. What is the language of the treaty? I read from page 410 of the same book. Article 1 provides:

> Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims, &c.

I need not read further; but it is sufficient to say that nowhere in this treaty are the Alabama claims referred to as claims of citizens of the United States against Great Britain, nor is compensation to them provided for. Under articles 1 to 11, inclusive, the tribunal at Geneva was established for the settlement of past and great present and future international questions between the two nations. It was to consider nothing but the question whether Great Britain had failed in her duty to the United States, and to determine the extent of the responsibility that might grow out of her possible neglect. But when we turn to article 12 of the treaty what do we find? The two powers are here contracting about the settlement of the claims of private individuals or corporations, and what is the language they there use? There is no mistake in it; and it has been copied from previous treaties:

> The high contracting parties agree that all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the government of Her Britannic Majesty, arising out of the acts committed against the persons or property of citizens of the United States during the period between the 13th of April, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865, inclusive, not being claims growing out of the acts of the vessels referred to in article 1 of this treaty, and all claims, with the like exception, on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, upon the Government of the United States, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of subjects of Her Britannic Majesty during the same period, which may have been presented to either government for its interposition with the other, and which yet remain unsettled, as well as any other such claims which may be presented within the time specified in article 14 of this treaty, shall be referred, &c.

Referred to what? To the tribunal at Geneva, to which had been referred the Alabama claims? Oh, no; they did not confound the public with the private questions, and consequently they provided for a separate commission, which was to meet in the city of Washington, and it met there and acted upon all these private claims arising upon the part of citizens of either of the two countries against the government of the other.

After the treaty was ratified, how was its language construed by the gentleman who was at the head of our Government and had charge of these matters? I have here his instructions to our attorneys when they were departing for Geneva. What does he say to them?

In the discussion of this question and in the treatment of the entire case you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded or what may be recovered in the event of the appointment of a board of assessors.

Mentioned in the 10th article of the treaty.

The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights of the claims of insurers. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected all such commital will be avoided.

And yet, sir, in the face of that explicit instruction to our counsel, which was as implicitly followed by them, the insurance companies say to us that the United States Government went to Geneva only as a lawyer, as a claim agent, as a trustee, or in some other belittling capacity, in which it was pushing the claims of insurance companies which had already more money than they well knew what to do with; and money, too, made out of war risks. No; we never would have hazarded all the great risks of war, with all the calamities incident thereto, for the purpose of putting additional sums in the coffers of insurance companies—never! What we wanted was a settlement of the questions between the two governments. We wanted these claims treated as public claims, as they are; and as such they were treated. We wanted to settle some questions for the future, because, although we happened to occupy the position of a belligerent in this unfortunate war, our usual policy had been in the past, and will be for the future, to occupy the position of a neutral, and we really desired adverse decisions on many pending questions because they would tend to our benefit in the future.

I pass now to the rest of this history. When this claim was being prosecuted at Geneva our attorneys said distinctly, we prosecute this as a case of one government against another. The following language was used by them:

These claims are all preferred by the United States as a nation against Great Britain as a nation, and are to be so computed and paid.

After we recovered the money, which was distinctly awarded to the Government of the United States, free from any claim of any private citizen, Great Britain took measures to provide for its payment. The appropriation of the money was made on the 26th day of May, 1873. In the course of the debate in the House of Commons (to be found in Foreign Relations of U. S., 1873, part 1, pages 368 to 377) Mr. Gladstone, then chancellor of the exchequer, replying to some strictures of the opposition, used the following language, (see page 374:)

Then the honorable gentleman asks why the arbitrators decided upon the claims of the United States before they considered the British claims against the United States. The honorable gentleman is in error in supposing that it was intended to give such precedence, or that precedence was actually given to the Alabama claims over private claims. The Alabama claim was a public claim arising between the two governments; the other claims were made by citizens of the United States against the British government.

He here distinctly recognizes all claims referred to the tribunal at Geneva as public claims; and those referred to the Washington commission, provided for in article 12, as private claims.

After the resolution appropriating the money was agreed to, the following took place, (see page 377:)

Sir I. Elphinstone asked the first lord of the treasury whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's government to submit the claims of Her Majesty's subjects for losses sustained by the capture of vessels containing British property by the Alabama to arbitration.

Mr. GLADSTONE. Her Majesty's government have no such intention. I think the question, judging from its form, has been put under an entire misapprehension. It appears to be implied that the government submitted the claims of certain persons not subjects of Her Majesty to arbitration. That is altogether a mistake. No claims of individuals have been submitted to arbitration in relation to the Alabama. What was submitted to arbitration was entirely a question between the two governments.

Can anything be more explicit? No member of Parliament objected to this statement. Of all its able lawyers and statesmen, not one rose in his seat and disputed its correctness. It was the accepted British opinion of the public nature of the controversy. When I am met upon this floor, Mr. Speaker, with the statement that only private claims were submitted and passed upon at Geneva, I must appeal from the judgment of the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] who gave so dogmatic an opinion upon this question. I appeal to the distinguished heads of the two governments, who had spent years in the study and consideration of these great questions while the gentleman from Indiana and myself were engaged in the courts of our respective States in the settlement of petty disputes between neighbors. They certainly knew what they were about. They certainly knew, better than he or I, the nature of the case. They certainly had the best counsel in either country as to the character of the controversy. And, in my judgment, no doubt would ever have been raised upon this point but from the immense power of the corporations who have an interest in a different construction, with the ability to confuse judgment by the employment of a multiplicity of well-known and well-paid lawyers of high reputation.

I pass now from the opinions of eminent statesmen to another kind of testimony—the judgment of a court upon the very question involved. Of course, I do not allude to it as binding upon us.

After we passed the law of June 23, 1874, providing for a partial distribution of this money, the court provided for therein met and gave decisions in many interesting cases. I will cite the opinion of the court in two of them.

I will cite first the opinion of the court in the case of Rhind vs. United States, to be found on page 33 of the report of the clerk of said court to the honorable Secretary of State:

Has he [the petitioner] such a right? He had a right of property in the ship which the Alabama destroyed, and he lost it without any act on the part of the Government of the United States, which could give him redress against it. The Government of the United States was not obliged to claim from Great Britain payment of the loss, but acted in that regard according to its sovereign pleasure. It did not succeed in obtaining payment of the whole of the claims presented, and the most careful investigation of the proceedings at Geneva has failed to show what claims were included in the award and what excluded therefrom. The award was made in favor of the Government and not in favor of the claimants. The Government thus vindicated the national honor, but it did not assume to pay any particular class of claimants nor any particular claim. Having obtained the money by its own act and at its own cost, it had the right to prescribe the terms on which the distribution should be made. It certainly had the power to exclude certain claimants and to include others less meritorious. In the act now before us, claimants are excluded who believe themselves justly entitled to a part of the fund, but they have no power to assert their right to it. Under the powers committed to us, we have in some instances rejected altogether claims presented at Geneva, and in many more instances we have largely reduced such claims in amount.

In the second case, the case of Robeson, as Secretary of the Navy, vs. The United States, for the recovery of the value of a vessel of war belonging to the United States Government destroyed by the Alabama, the court giving judgment against Mr. Robeson, as Secretary, uses the following language, (see page 121 of the same report:)

The reclamation made upon Great Britain was made by our Government in its capacity of sovereign, and not as a mere representative of private interests, and the indemnity received has been paid to the United States as a government. The fund is now in the Treasury entirely under the control of Congress, invested as directed by Congress, and was so when the act constituting this court was passed. Congress might have refused to pass any act providing for the indemnification of citizens; it might have retained the whole fund; it did appropriate such part of the fund as it judged just and right to be distributed among certain classes of claimants therefor. After the payment of the amount of our judgments, as provided by law, it may still retain the balance remaining, or it may provide for a further distribution among other classes of claimants. But in so doing it will dispose of its own; of money held in the Treasury of the Government free from all restraints except those which ought to influence any sovereign power, under the circumstances.

A MEMBER. What court gave those decisions?

Mr. MCMAHON. The court of commissioners of Alabama claims, composed of five judges sitting under the law of June, 1874—gentlemen with whom I am not personally acquainted, but whose decisions and impartiality I am assured gave pretty general satisfaction.

I do not wish to be understood as casting any imputation upon the entire fairness claimed by gentlemen of the committee reporting the majority bill; but that clause, in section 1 of their bill, which orders the Court of Claims to distribute this money "without regard to any rule or principle of allowance, exclusion, inclusion or distribution adopted by the tribunal created by" the law of 1874, would seem to be aimed expressly at the decisions I have just cited. And I cannot understand why the principle of these decisions should be set aside or repealed, as they were the opinions of men learned in the law, upon abstract questions, not depending solely upon a construction of the law of 1874, but upon the effect of the treaty and award themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim that if any one proposition, as a proposition of authority, can be established, it is that the only thing that was presented at Geneva was a national claim; that the only thing that was passed upon was a claim between the two governments; and the only person to whom money was awarded was the Government of the United States.

But this proposition does not depend upon authority. It would have but little respectable authority for its support if it was not founded in reason and international law, as I will now proceed to show to the best of my ability. The claim could not strictly be any other than a public claim for this simple reason: that all the property that was destroyed upon the high seas by confederate cruisers was destroyed in a state of public war, which by the law of nations is a legal destruction, and gives no claim to the citizen against his own government, or against the government whose ships or citizens did the injury, or against those citizens, or against any open and acknowledged or secret and insidious ally. When the ship and cargo go to the bottom of the sea the property is gone, and no right springs into existence in its place. But had our Government been at peace with all the world and had the destruction of the ships and cargoes of American merchants occurred by the wrongful act of one of two other belligerent nations the case would have been different. Let me suppose that France and England were at war and that the privateers of either nation had destroyed American ships pursuing a legal and innocent trade. By the acknowledged laws of nations the merchant owning the ships has a legal right to compensation. All codes of law admit that the right exists. There may not be an adequate remedy. The courts of the offending nation may not be open to aliens—and they never are except by permission of the nation itself. The government of the injured citizen may not have the ability or disposition to interfere with diplomacy or the strong arm of war. But nevertheless, as was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Comegys vs. Vasse, the right exists. And I use the word "right" in its proper legal sense, not as synonymous with "claim;" for claim is as broad as the ingenuity and roguery of the human race, whereas right is circumscribed by the fixed and immutable principles of natural justice.

And now we can account for the different language used in describing, in article 1 of the treaty of Washington, the claim made by our Government upon Great Britain for compensation or indemnity for the property that was destroyed by the confederate cruisers in a state of war existing between the Confederate States and the Government of the United States, and the language used in article 12 of that treaty for injuries done to citizens of States that were not in a state of war with each other. It would not have been correct legal language to have spoken of the Alabama claims as the private claims of individuals. And on the other hand, the claims provided for in article 12 were claims arising out of the violation of private rights of person or property of persons whose country was not in a state of war with the government doing the injury, giving to the citizen injured a right to compensation—the remedy to be afforded by his government when it saw fit and in the manner its judgment approved. Such private claims have generally been pressed by and upon our Government as the claims of individuals. For the government can scarcely suffer a material injury which is not represented by a corresponding injury to some citizen or domiciled person. And on the other hand an injury cannot occur to the person or property of a citizen which is not also an injury to the government to which he belongs. An inspection of all the treaties of the United States Government will show that we have made over twenty separate treaties providing for reclamations from foreign governments for injuries done to our citizens or their property; and this striking fact will appear that every one of these reclamations was for injuries done to our citizens by a nation with whom we were then at peace and while we were at peace with all the world; and in each and every treaty—and I challenge contradiction—explicit language was used in regard to such claims, stamping them, without exception, as the claims of individuals. I refer to our numerous treaties with Great Britain, Spain, and France, and to our treaties with Denmark, Mexico, China, Texas, Costa Rica, New Grenada, Algiers, Peru, the Two Sicilies, and Venezuela. In all these cases the rights of our citizens were illegally interfered with, and our Government took up such rights and prosecuted them as individual claims with success. In such cases it was eminently proper that the Government should regard the fund it received as received for the benefit of those exclusively who had been injured. The right to compensation existing should be recognized and satisfied by our Government. But even in such a case, as was expressly decided in the English courts in the recent important case of Rustomjee vs. The Queen, (cited in the minority report,) the act of distribution is a sovereign act, and is only remitted to the courts for the convenience of the government itself and at its pleasure.

But, says some gentleman, if the Government did not recover upon these claims as private claims, upon what ground did it proceed? It proceeded upon the general proposition that as between nations all the property in the territory of each nation belongs to the nation as a whole. I cannot express this better than in the language of Vattel, whose doctrine will also be found in Rutherford's Institutes. I read from chapter 7, page 164:

> Even the property of individuals is, in the aggregate, to be considered as the property of nations, with respect to other states. It, in some sort, really belongs to her, from the right she has over the property of her citizens, because it constitutes a part of the sum total of her riches and augments her power. She is interested in that property by her obligation to protect all her members. In short, it cannot be otherwise, since nations act and treat together as bodies in their quality of political societies, and are considered as so many moral persons. All those who form a society, a nation being considered by foreign nations as constituting only one whole, one single person—all their wealth together can only be considered as the wealth of that same person.

This is very clear and needs no further illustration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, because no private claims were submitted to the tribunal at Geneva, because no money was awarded to private individuals, either in gross or separately, because it was a question solely between the two governments, I say that there is no legal or equitable right to the fund in anybody, and when I speak of legal and equitable right I do not use the term in the sense of natural justice but as we lawyers understand it.

I take it for granted that if it can be shown that the insurance companies have no legal or equitable right to this fund no gentleman on this floor will be willing to allow them to share in a fund that was given us as an indemnity to our fellow-citizens, and was not contended for to enrich those who have already grown rich enough out of their exactions upon shippers and ship-owners by their excessive war premiums.

"But," says some one, "let us send it to the courts. The courts are the only appropriate tribunals." My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STENGER] made one of the most plausible appeals to this House to let this whole question go to the courts. He said we were not a proper body to distribute this money. Let us look at the majority bill, under which we are asked to refer these questions to the court. Let us see how peculiarly it is worded. It reads as follows:

> That all persons and corporations claiming to be entitled—may go into court; these insurance companies may go; private citizens may go; foreigners and foreign insurance companies may go; all persons may go before the Court of Claims, and the court—> shall render judgment for each claimant who was an actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain for such an amount as in their opinion he shall be justly entitled to recover under such treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations, without regard to any rule—

That is one thing—

> or principle—

That is another thing—

> of allowance, exclusion, inclusion, or distribution heretofore adopted by Congress in chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress, or otherwise, or by the tribunal created by said law.

I cannot understand why the majority of the committee in framing this bill were anxious to overturn the rules or principles of distribution prescribed in a statute which has long since expired and ceased to be a law. But I am much more surprised at the proposition to exclude any "rule or principle" adopted by the court of five judges who have heretofore distributed this money by judicial decision. I cannot understand why it was necessary to repeal or annul a dead law, or to exclude the general propositions of law that might have been decided by a court once established for the distribution of this very fund.

I say that that bill is not a fair bill. It is not impartial. It assumes the very question at issue. It does not give an equal chance to all persons. On the contrary, I say that those who paid large war premiums and those who suffered losses by the exculpated cruisers, whose claims I shall hereafter consider, will not have the remotest chance. Only the insurance companies, if anybody, would have any standing; and they would get it only by the peculiar language and effect of the bill itself. I do not say they could prosecute successfully. But I will say this much, that only they could make the pretense of a showing.

We received this money to distribute as a nation. The majority assumes that we received it for individuals. My friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] substantially admitted away the whole case of the majority in his very able and ingenious argument, when he said that we are only under "a moral obligation" to distribute this fund. If the insurance companies have any right to this fund we are under a legal obligation to let them have it. It is our duty as a legislature just as much as it would be the duty of a court to give it to them if their claim is founded upon a legal or equitable right. But if only moral obligations are involved, we are bound by the general principles of justice, and should not snatch the money of sufferers to bestow it upon those who have become rich, in part, at their expense.

But this majority bill says, "You gentlemen who claim this fund may go into a court." What court? A court of the narrowest jurisdiction; the Court of Claims without equity powers; which would and could only act upon the narrow rules of law settling strict right among men. And then the bill says to the Court of Claims, "You are instructed to give this fund to those who can show that they are entitled to it under the treaty and the award." Why, sir, the bill assumes the very question in controversy which we are now discussing, that somebody has a right under the award. By the bill the Government abandons its right to distribute this money according to our notions of justice and equity, and it says to the court below, because that court is bound by the express or implied instructions of the law which we may pass, "We do not claim this money as belonging to the Government, as belonging to the Treasury; nor do we desire to distribute it under our sovereign power. We admit that it belongs to individuals; that it was awarded to individuals; and you will please find out who under the award has the best right to it." This is almost an express instruction to pay only those whose claims can be shown to have been included in the award. And under such a law only the insurance companies, as the controversy now stands, would have the ghost of a chance.

As I said in the opening of my argument, a proposition to refer to a court appeals strongly to the sympathy of all lawyers. It appeals more strongly to the uninformed or occupied legislator. If anybody had a legal or equitable right, as we understand the term, I would not only be in favor of letting him go to the courts, but would be glad to be rid of the wearisome investigation and debate we have had. But the preliminary question for this House to decide is whether there is a legal or equitable right in any one, because the court cannot enforce moral obligations. The court can only act upon titles. And what would be the condition of this controversy and of the needy claimants, if after three years of litigation under the majority bill the Supreme Court should finally decide that under that bill nobody had any rights which a court could enforce? We should then be where we are now.

That I am right in the proposition that a reference to the courts would narrow the rules of decision, allow me to make a suggestion. Suppose the House should refer this matter to the Court of Claims, "with as full power to distribute this fund as Congress may have."

Does not every gentleman see at once that, although that court is bound by rules of law, yet if it had conferred upon it, and could receive, such power, then the chances of all claimants would be equal; and the controversy would be transferred from this unwieldy body to a smaller number of persons learned in the law. Such a reference would not be so objectionable as the present bill, although the dangers of appointing a court, or clothing one already appointed, with such extraordinary powers would be unusual and might be dangerous. The appearance of the majority bill is that it confers such power, but in reality it does not. For the instruction to the Court of Claims to decide according to "justice, equity, and the law of nations" is the unmeaning language of precedent, and does not abridge or enlarge the jurisdiction or power of that court. It would look only for titles, and discover them under the ordinary rules. I do not think that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STENGER] was in earnest when he said that if we send this case to the Court of Claims to be decided according to equity, that court will act upon the definition of equity given by Grotius. Equity has a different meaning in the jurisprudence of the United States and of Great Britain. It has a well-defined and much narrower meaning in these days. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the very same breath in which he said he was for referring this question to the courts because they were better able to investigate and determine it and because they could administer broad equity as well as we, said he was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

The question involved in that amendment is whether an insurance company should be considered an actual loser unless the sum of its losses by war risks exceeded the sum of its war premiums received. Is that a legal question? Is that a question for a court of equity? Is that a question upon which a court of law or equity can give a decision more in consonance with the principles of justice and equity than can this body? I would like to see some attorney pleading in the Court of Claims against these insurance companies, if an amendment of this kind defining their rights is not adopted. An insurance company comes in for a loss upon the ship Brilliant, for example. The company says, "We insured her for $100,000 and we received a premium of $10,000; hence we are actual losers and our net loss is $90,000." Under the majority bill the case would end here, and the insurers of this vessel would come out of court with $90,000. Under what rule of law or equity, or what provision of this majority bill, would the court have the right to say to the insurance company, "Don't be so fast; bring in your books; let us see the amount of the war premiums you received in cases where you suffered no loss; and we will offset them against your losses and see whether you are an actual sufferer." Such a proposition would be scouted. Yet my friend from Pennsylvania, who claims that this is a fair bill, that it gives the insurance companies only an equal chance with other people, thinks that we are not equal to the settlement of such a question as this, and wants to prevent its determination in the only tribunal that has the power to settle it—that is Congress. We are the only body that can compel an insurance company to make an exhibit of its whole war-premium business and require the deduction of all the war premiums from the losses alleged to have been suffered, to ascertain the net loss.

Is that a complicated question of law or equity? Is it not a political or public question? Are we unequal to its decision? Ought we to give up our opportunity to settle it when we have the power and the right to do so?

Most certainly not; and we should vote for the amendment. The business in which these companies were engaged involved only the receipt and disbursement of money—the receipt of premiums and the payment of losses. When the cruisers began their damage the business of assuming war risks began. It involved no additional expense to the companies; no new buildings, clerks, or offices; not even new paper, pens, or ink; but everything proceeded as usual. They charged heavy extra premiums. In doing so they made enormous profits. These profits were made in the war-risk business, and it is only of such profits that the amendment of Mr. FRYE demands an account. These profits were made only out of war premiums. Their business was not complicated by the circumstances surrounding a merchant. They did not deal in cloths, sugars, teas, coffees, hardware, or merchandise. They had no general business, outside of the receipt of money as premiums, in which to lose or gain, so as to complicate the solution of the question as to what their losses or gains were due. And when they present themselves here as actual losers by the presence of confederate cruisers upon the high seas we are compelled to say to them, "Let us inspect your books. It is a simple question. If you paid out more money in war losses than you received in war premiums in all your war risk business, you are truly a loser and may share in this fund. But if you charged such enormous premiums as to lose nothing, but actually to largely increase your profits, you became gainers by the conduct of Great Britain, and we cannot recognize your claim to share in an indemnity fund under the false pretense of being 'actual losers.'" The substitute contains Mr. FRYE's amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the next strong argument that is made by gentlemen on the other side, and insisted upon in the report of the majority with great vigor and ability, is the argument drawn from previous precedents. They affirm that all the precedents are in favor of the bill of the majority, and they refer us to the treaties with England, Denmark, China, the Two Sicilies, Peru, France, Brazil, and Spain, in all of which a gross sum was awarded to the United States Government for the satisfaction of private claims. And they say, and say truly, that in all, the division was remitted to a court or commission in language similar to that used in this bill. I have carefully examined all these treaties.

In each case the reclamation was made for injuries done to our citizens while we were at peace. In each treaty the claims were preferred as the private claims of individuals. And in no single case does it appear that any controversy arose as to the classes of persons who should share in the money. The questions were chiefly questions of fact, such as we refer to the court in the minority substitute. Under such circumstances, our citizens having, as I have already argued at length in the opening, a legal right to compensation, it was proper to send all the parties to a court to determine the extent and value of that right. Their property had been illegally captured or destroyed. The payment of the money is stipulated in each treaty to be on their account. And in no case that I have found do the peculiar questions arise that surround this controversy.

But these precedents are only analogous. They are wanting in the chief element that gives rise to the discussion. In the Geneva fund we have seen that no one has a right, legal or equitable. It was recovered by the nation on the national title and not for individuals on their private title. It was paid to the nation without committal, and its distribution is an act of justice in general and not the mere recognition of existing legal titles.

I was very much interested in the able and plausible argument of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] who rested his approval of the majority bill almost entirely upon its accord with the precedents. But he had not given the case that thorough examination which it needs, and he must permit me to say that he fell into a very serious and contradictory position. I desire to call attention to the gentleman's exact language:

> Precedents, when exactly in point with the case under consideration, are usually held to have a binding authority, as well to keep the scales of justice even and steady as because the question to be decided has been solemnly considered and determined. And it is therefore a time-honored maxim that when a point has been settled by decision it forms a precedent which it is not wise to depart from, unless, in the language of Mr. Blackstone, "it is manifestly absurd and unjust." It is to be hoped that no step will be taken by the Congress of the United States to lessen the value of that great doctrine of stare decisis which has been so cordially approbated and observed through many generations by the good and wise men of the world.

This is very well and very ably stated. How far the doctrine may be applied to a legislative body is uncertain. We know that it is rarely applied to political questions; that it does not apply to many other questions of a public character; but I will admit its full, persuasive force in all matters which concern merely personal or private rights. I want the House, however, to observe in the first place that the cases are not even analogous, as I have already shown, and I am sure that the honorable gentleman will himself admit that there is another rule of action higher and better than the one he states, and that is the rule that a decision made by a previous Congress in the identical case, if precedents are worth anything, is worth all the merely analogous decisions of a hundred other cases put together. If the gentleman from Mississippi wants this House to stand by the precedents, to adhere to the doctrine of stare decisis, upon the presumption that the question has been solemnly considered and decided, I am with him, heart and soul, in this case. But why does he advocate a bill which repeals every rule and principle settled by a prior solemn law of Congress under which one-half of this money has already been distributed. Why does he ask us to vote for a bill that repeals not only the principles of that law, but the solemn decisions of a court of justice rendered under it? If he had given this part of the subject more careful attention he could not have failed to discover that the minority bill is based on his idea. We have already given a public character by law to this fund. Our courts have already decided certain questions under that law, and upon the general right. We have already, as a Government, adopted certain rules for the distribution of this fund, and to adopt the bill which the gentleman advocates is to go back upon all that Congress and the courts have done in this particular matter; putting the Government of the United States in the extraordinary position of deciding in 1874 all the questions involved in this controversy in one way, and reversing its action in every particular in four years after, because a powerful lobby may have confused the judgment of some of us by the multitude of its pamphlets.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PRIDEMORE in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask by unanimous consent that my friend may have his time extended sufficiently to enable him to complete his argument.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will give the gentleman another hour if he desires to occupy it. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the House for its indulgence. The question will not admit of more brevity.

To show to the House that I am right in saying that all these questions have been once adjudicated by the House, in the language of the gentleman from Mississippi, I need only refer to the previous history of legislation. The insurance lobby was here just as powerful in 1873 and 1874 as now. It has lost nothing by age. All the arguments now advanced by them were advanced then. The honorable Mr. Evarts appeared before the committee. Able men considered these questions in both Houses, and they agreed upon a law, the law of 1874.

In that law they determined, by express provision, that only certain classes of claimants should be admitted. They required losers to deduct the insurance money received. They said to insurance companies, you may participate, but you must render an account of all premiums received in war risks, as against war losses claimed. The courts were opened. Losers by the Alabama, Florida, and the Shenandoah came in. When their insurance-money was deducted, their net loss amounted to only $9,100,000. A few insurance companies came in and proved themselves actual losers to the extent of $111,000. Thus, after providing for all losers of ships and cargoes by the three inculpated cruisers, (deducting insurance-money received,) and after providing for the payment to insurance companies of all losses they had suffered by war risks taken by them upon vessels destroyed by the said inculpated cruisers, (deducting the war premiums received by them in their business,) we have settled with all persons supposed to have been included in the award at Geneva, and we have a large surplus of money on hand. This surplus does not arise from overvaluation by the tribunal, or the practice of sharp Yankee tricks, but by the deduction of the insurance-money received by losers, and the requirement that insurance companies must show net loss, as I have already stated.

All this the bill of the majority would rip up and unsettle; for the concluding paragraph of section 1 contemplates the reopening of adjudicated cases when it says:

But all payments heretofore made on any claim by the United States shall be deducted from the judgment to be rendered thereon.

Having settled by the law of 1874 with all persons supposed to have been included at Geneva, the question now recurs, What shall we do with the balance? It amounts to nearly $10,000,000.

One person says, "Keep it in the Treasury." Another speaks for internal-improvement schemes; a third proposes a division among retiring members of Congress. [Laughter.] Many such plausible schemes are advocated, and have been considered.

The proposition to turn the money into the Treasury would have been more weighty if we had not already paid large sums to persons who were not more meritorious than some who are yet unpaid. Having commenced to treat this fund as an indemnity for losers upon the high seas, I think we should continue in the same line. And, after careful consideration, the minority have come to a conclusion which has heretofore always met the approbation of the members of this branch of the National Legislature whenever the question was presented to it. In the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses bills have readily passed by large majorities in this House for the relief of war-premium payers and losers by the exculpated cruisers.

Some person exclaims immediately, "War-premium payments were excluded, as indirect losses, by the interlocutory judgment of the tribunal at Geneva in June, 1872;" and another says that, upon trial by the tribunal, "Great Britain was not found guilty as to the losses suffered by the exculpated cruisers." "Will you," exclaim both, "pay people whose claims were not recognized?" And our familiarity with mere legal proceedings prevents a proper consideration of these questions in a broad and statesman-like manner.

My answer to all this is found in the argument made in the opening. We preferred this claim as a nation, prosecuted it as a nation, recovered it as a nation, and now hold the money as a nation. Our purpose in all this, acceded to by Great Britain, was to hold the power of distribution in our hands without committal. To facilitate this the arbitrators carefully concealed the method by which they arrived at the sum total, and they awarded a sum in gross. For a long time before the treaty was made our Government endeavored to procure the consent of Great Britain to agree to fix upon a gross sum in the treaty itself to be paid to us. Failing in that, the provision was made for a gross sum at the discretion of the tribunal, upon finding Great Britain guilty of neglect in any one particular.

I can readily understand why claims for enhanced rates of insurance were excluded by the tribunal. The payment of war risks did not necessarily involve the loss of any national wealth. It was the transfer of money from the pocket of John Smith, merchant, or John Jones, ship-owner, into the coffers of some American insurance company. This might be serious loss to Smith or Jones, but it was equal gain to the insurance company, and therefore no net loss to the nation, as no property was destroyed, but only transferred from one citizen to another. But is Smith or Jones any the less a loser? It is true their loss could not be recovered upon at Geneva. But when the nation has recovered a gross sum in its own name and upon its own title, what rule of international law, or natural law, or justice, or constitutional right, will prevent it from recognizing the losses of Smith and Jones, instead of paying the money to the insurance companies, whose exorbitant rates of insurance drove more vessels from under the American flag than the confederate cruisers destroyed?

So with the case of losers by exculpated cruisers. These men were not at Geneva. They had no control of the litigation whatever. Their counsel and witnesses were not there. As to quite a number of the confederate cruisers the Government of the United States offered no testimony whatever, as an inspection of the award itself will show; and such was the testimony of General Cushing before the subcommittee having this matter in charge. How is it possible for a fair-minded legislator to say that such a person has had a day in court and failed? The Government of the United States was not even prosecuting his case as his agent or attorney. It was prosecuting, as we have seen, upon its own title, expecting to do ample justice at home with the money which it might receive. And that nobody's rights were prejudged at Geneva or destroyed by the action of the tribunal is frankly admitted by the candid gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] who said in his argument on this floor a few weeks ago:

The mode of distribution has not been preadjudicated. We are here to-day to say what the mode ought to be.

I agree with him entirely upon this proposition, and we part company upon only the narrowest basis. He would not permit the amendment of Mr. FRYE. I would. He believes there are rights. I do not. If I did, he and I would agree entirely.

Mr. HOUSE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSE. Have any of the claimants whose claims were excluded from consideration at Geneva been paid?

Mr. McMAHON. No, sir. But some not presented have been paid, and some presented have been rejected.

Mr. HOUSE. Were any of their claims presented?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, sir; several were presented, so as to make a test case, both as to war premiums and exculpated-cruiser losses; and the court decided it had no jurisdiction, because the law of Congress directed the court what it should consider, and it could not look further than the law. Section 11 of the law of 1874 expressly confined the power of the court to consider claims arising from damage caused by the cruisers Alabama, Florida, and the Shenandoah after leaving Melbourne.

Is it not a hardship that losers by the exculpated cruisers are not paid? Take the instance of Mr. Metcalf, from the State of Ohio. His ship was destroyed by the Shenandoah just before going into Melbourne. He receives no pay, but the ship destroyed just after the Shenandoah steamed out from that port has been fully settled for.

My proposition is, and it is the fundamental principle of the minority substitute, that all actual net losses should be paid to all persons who suffered actual damage by the presence of confederate cruisers upon the high seas. I have fully considered the objection made to such payment upon the ground of their rejection at Geneva. I do not think it valid.

I will next consider the proposition: Were they actual losers?

There can be no doubt that a man whose ship or cargo was destroyed by an exculpated cruiser was an actual loser to the extent of the value of his ship or cargo, less the insurance money, if any, which he may have received. This needs no further argument.

The question is more difficult as to war-premium payers. It has been argued that they were not actual losers; that the extra war risks were charged up in the price of goods or freight, and that in this way their losses were reimbursed out of the public in general. This statement is vigorously denied by persons holding such claims; and their statements would seem to be in accord with the nature and situation of American shipping during the war.

I think it is fair to say that we did not own one-eighth of the shipping of the world during the time we speak of. And it is equally fair to say that from 60 to 70 per cent. of the war-premium claims preferred are put forward by owners of ships. I cannot understand how, either in our own or in foreign ports, except in the coastwise trade, one-eighth of the shipping could dictate prices to the remaining seven-eighths, whose competition with each other would settle freight without reference to American bottoms. One would suppose that American shipping would be avoided; that it would find only casual employment under the American flag; and that its losses from demurrage and loss of freight would far exceed the war premiums it would have to pay. To repay such ship-owners their war premiums, which was the penalty for floating the American flag, would be repayment of only a small portion of their losses. If they obtained cargoes, they would be compelled to reduce their freights to leave the merchant a margin for the payment of his war premiums; or he might stipulate that the ship should pay such premium, which would amount to almost the same thing. It is well known that in the Eastern trade our merchants do business upon credits, and that the bankers who furnish these require insurance to accompany the bill of lading. What became of such merchants as were engaged in the valuable and costly trade of that section of the world, or of ship-owners who wished to carry silks, teas, and such valuable cargoes?

But we are not left to mere inference upon these questions, conclusive though it may be. I hold in my hand various documents which will throw some light upon this subject. I read to the House from an original price-current list issued in Bombay in December, 1863, by Dossabhoy, Merwanjee & Co. Under the head of "Freights," it says:

Freights to England have been generally active during the period under review, but vessels under the American flag have found great difficulty in obtaining employment except for the country trade; several have been sold and changed their flag. The prejudice against this flag will, we are afraid, be considerably enhanced from the fact of the "Alabama" being in Indian waters. About a month ago she was spoken by a British vessel not far from Point de Galle, and it was expected she would visit this place, but it seems she has changed her course, having gone into China waters.

I hold in my hand another original document, the price-current list of Shanghai of January 25, 1864, issued by Augustin Heard & Co. It says:

The Henry Harbeck and the Algonquin (both American) have been sold for less than £6,000 each, but there has been no inquiry for vessels of this nationality since the news was received of the destruction of the Martaban, under English colors, (formerly the Texan Star, of Boston,) by the Alabama; that act has much impaired the confidence formerly placed in the validity of transfers made of American vessels to neutral flags.

I hold another list issued by Augustin Heard & Co., at Hong Kong, October 31, 1863, in which it says under the same heading:

Freights: There is a decided improvement in the demand for tonnage, the inquiry being restricted, however, to vessels under the English and continental flags to the total exclusion of American bottoms, as the Chinese are unwilling to ship by the latter and some of the local officers decline taking any risk of them.

From one of these documents we discover that twenty-one American vessels are then lying idle in port. At another date in another port fifteen American vessels are idle in port.

I might quote many similar documents, and I have in my possession many original letters written during that period confirming all that these documents tell us. Do they not tell a sad tale for the American ship-owner? And the person who suffered is the man whose love for his flag and his ship would not permit him to transfer it to another nationality or to part with it altogether. Do not the claims of such men appeal most peculiarly to our sense of justice?

But I have several other documents which I desire to lay before the House in this connection.

I hold in my hand several copies of charter parties entered into between the agent of the Peruvian government and the firm of Sturges, Buchanan & Co., part owners of American ships. After the usual stipulations for receipt and delivery of cargoes, &c., we find the following clause:

The ship is to furnish a policy of insurance as agreed before commencing to load, covering the cargo against war risk at the rate of $60 per ton in gold, premium paid by ship

Thus the American ship-owner paid a war premium not only upon his vessel, but upon the cargo which did not belong to him. These were the penalties he paid for his preference for the flag of his nation or his love for his ship. Should any technical arguments stand in the way of his reimbursement? And who are his antagonists? The very men to whom these premiums were paid.

I say that a denial of his claim to compensation is not founded in justice. He has no technical rights, I admit; but he has powerful equities. And when a gentleman says on this floor that rather than give it to one of the war-premium men or ship-owners he would give it back to Great Britain, and that we would be dishonored if we did not do so, I say his sense of honor is entirely too nice and too fine, and would be met with a guffaw on the other side of the Atlantic instead of being regarded as a wise and statesman-like measure. Since the award in the fishery question, England is more than satisfied. The money paid is not a tithe of the injury both sections suffered by the hostile attitude of Great Britain—the North by the destruction of its property and the prolongation of the war, and the South by the delusive hope held out of recognition which led her into the prolonged struggle for separate existence long after her capacity to accomplish it alone was exhausted. But if we received small pecuniary compensation we were well rewarded in the principles settled for future use. If we had succeeded in holding Great Britain responsible for the increased cost of the war, for the enhanced rates of insurance, and the transfer of our marine to other flags, all of which claims were ruled out as indirect, the next war in which England was engaged might have seen the seas covered with American Alabamas, whose ravages would drive the English merchantmen from the ocean, and whose enormous bills against this Government would equal the present public debt. The trial at Geneva was singular in this respect. Each party was seeking to narrow the liability of the defendant, and to insure as narrow a basis of computation as possible.

Mr. ELAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMAHON. Certainly.

Mr. ELAM. Do you propose to pay losses that resulted from the action of exculpated cruisers?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, and upon this basis: that the award at Geneva was not an award in favor of any class of claimants as against another; that all that was settled there was how much was to be paid by Great Britain, and the money paid was paid in satisfaction of all "claims referred by the treaty."

I will refer the gentleman to article 7 of the treaty which provides that "in case the tribunal finds that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, it may, if it think proper, proceed to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it."

Mr. ELAM. Allow me to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. McMAHON. Before I leave this point will the gentleman allow me to conclude what I was stating? The language is: "For all the claims referred to it, and in such case it shall be so paid." Gentlemen might argue that this sentence is a settlement clause; that Great Britain when she paid the money wanted to be understood as paying it in settlement of all the claims in controversy, and therefore she wanted a clause in the treaty that the payment was in full and final settlement of all such claims. Undoubtedly.

But we find that in a separate article of the treaty, article 11, which is the settlement clause for the Alabama claims alone, it is provided that—

When a sum in gross is so paid the high contracting parties agree to consider the result of the tribunal as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims herein referred to, and further engage that such claims, whether the same may have or may not have been presented to the tribunal at Geneva, are settled.

It is plain that under the treaty it was intended that when a sum in gross was awarded it was awarded in payment of all the claims referred to the tribunal, and not of any special claims. For it is only when a board of assessors should meet that the validity of any claim could come in question.

Mr. ELAM. Suppose the arbitrators had decided that Great Britain was not responsible for the action of any of these confederate cruisers; would Great Britain have paid any money at all?

Mr. McMAHON. I think she would not; she would not for this reason——

Mr. ELAM. Answer the question, please. In that case would the arbitrators have held Great Britain liable for the payment of any sum of money?

Mr. McMAHON. Certainly not, for the Government of the United States would have lost its whole case.

Mr. ELAM. Then has not the Government of the United States lost the case in regard to all the cruisers except the inculpated cruisers?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes; but it was only the Government which lost this part of its case; the claimants have not lost their case, or any part of it. The claimants were not at Geneva in person or by proxy. I never yet heard of a man being estopped by a proceeding in any court when he never had a day, or a pleading, or a lawyer, or a witness in court. I think we never ought to apply the doctrine of estoppel in these claims, when the claimants had no possible control over the proceedings.

Now my fundamental proposition is that we ought to distribute this fund upon as broad a basis as that on which we made the original claim for settlement. What was our claim against Great Britain? I cannot take up time in elaborate argument, but will state it briefly. Our case was that the precipitate act of Great Britain in recognizing the confederacy was the beginning and the end of all the trouble to which our ships and cargoes were subjected. From the very beginning Secretary Seward and Minister Adams made claim upon Great Britain in about these words: that Great Britain not only gave birth to the naval power of the confederate government, but nourished, maintained, and equipped it throughout the entire war; and we could not but hold Great Britain responsible for every particle of the damage that resulted. This ground we held from the recognition referred to until 1869. Then we changed our position. For a long time we insisted that when this case was to be referred to arbitration the question of the premature recognition should be submitted to the arbitrators. But Great Britain said that was a question she never would agree to submit. Finally, in the interest of peace, (and the correspondence shows it,) our minister, Mr. Motley, was instructed by Mr. Secretary Fish that in all future negotiations upon the Alabama claims, the submission to arbitration of the premature recognition of the Confederate States should not be insisted on, and he should simply proceed upon the second point, which was the conduct of Great Britain in permitting vessels of war to escape, or equip, or refit in her ports.

But when we waived that first point we did not do so because we were wrong. We did not so admit. And I appeal to any man on either side whether our position was not a correct one. We had a treaty of peace with Great Britain. Our war was not in the beginning a war between two separate contending nations. It was one part of the United States trying to fly off from the General Government. It presented itself in the shape of an intestine commotion, and we had a right to demand that Great Britain should hold off and not recognize the southern people as belligerents until they had manifested a power upon the high seas and had shown themselves capable of maintaining themselves. But the recognition of belligerency by Great Britain took place precipitately on the very day that our new minister, Mr. Adams, arrived in London. That recognition was promulgated before a battle had been fought, before a vessel of the confederacy was upon the high seas. It was entirely true that the aid and comfort exhibited by the English government in unfriendliness to our Government gave birth to the naval power of the confederate government. And whatever claim we had was the right that one government has to charge another with all the consequences of her unfriendly or hostile conduct. This we did; and our original just claim covered all the damage by confederate cruisers.

Let us, then, pay out this money to all actual losers to whom we would have paid it if Great Britain had agreed to pay us a sum in gross without the intervention of a tribunal of arbitration.

Mr. BRIDGES. I understood the gentleman to say that those who suffered losses by exculpated cruisers are entitled to this money.

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, sir; that is, to a portion of it, not to all. I do not say entitled as a matter of right; but as persons equally deserving with those who have been paid.

Mr. BRIDGES. Upon what principle are they entitled to this money in contradistinction to every other citizen of the United States? If they thought proper to risk their property upon the high seas, with the hope of gain, and with the possibility of loss, is it not their fault and not the fault of the people of the United States?

Mr. McMAHON. Well, you might say the same to the sailors who enlisted in the marine service in the hope of prize-money, and had their arm or leg shot off; that they took the risk and the Government ought not to give them a pension. The commerce of the country (and this was the able argument made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Jenckes, in the last House) stands upon a different footing from its internal relations. Commerce ought to be fostered; the men who navigate ships ought to be preferred if they stand in the line of preferment. If the men who preferred to let the American flag fly over their vessels, instead of taking it down, suffered loss thereby, they ought to be preferred—certainly by a gentleman from Pennsylvania. A large portion of our people did consult the instincts of gain and made a formal transfer of their ships to the British or other flags. There their ships are. Do we not suffer to-day from the contracted amount of American shipping? Are we not all anxious to have our shipping extended?

Mr. BRIDGES. We suffer as a nation from contracted commerce.

Mr. McMAHON. But the individuals who kept their ships under the American flag, and thereby incurred and paid extra risks, suffered just that much in addition, for they bore all the other burdens as well as you and I. These premiums were their extra loss.

And now, in conclusion, I desire to refer to an argument of which the most seems to have been made on the other side, considering its unimportance. A great deal is made of it in the report of the committee. It is said it will not do to establish a new court, and thereupon the ideas used in a former report by my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] are quoted as a solemn warning: "You will have too many judges; you will have a perpetual court; there will be a lobby about it; there will be this and that, and many other extraordinary things." The answer I have to make is this: The warnings of that gentleman were disregarded. The special court was instituted by the Congress to which he gave them. The special court tried cases; it gave general satisfaction; it did not prove perpetual; it disposed, in a reasonable time, of its business, and expired.

All the evils apprehended failed to occur. And we find at the present time the gentleman from Massachusetts agreeing to a report to establish another special court. Experience has taught him that he was wrong. And he is one of those wise men who know when they have made a mistake and do not hesitate to acknowledge it.

Gentlemen who assail the minority substitute upon this ground would do well to follow his example. There are no dangers in the establishment of such a court, and many advantages will come from it. In the first place the public business will not be delayed in the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court. In the next place, all the expense of litigation will be paid, under the substitute, out of the fund, and not out of the public Treasury, as provided in the majority bill. And having settled the principles of distribution by law, there will be no danger of the influence of the lobby. The court will deal with questions of fact chiefly; and certainly will, if properly selected, be as honest, as capable, and as satisfactory as the court to which the majority incline so decidedly.

Mr. Speaker, I am under very great obligations to the gentlemen of the House for the courtesy they have extended to me in this matter. I only wish to say in conclusion that the extended argument that I have made has not been made in the interest of any client in the shape or disguise of a constituent. I have none interested either way. The only person known to me to be interested in my State is the gentleman to whom I referred awhile ago, who lives hundreds of miles from me, and whom I never knew until I came here; and of him I will say that although a citizen of Ohio he is one of recent date; but Ohio has no need to be ashamed to own him, for he has shown unusual vigor and ability in the pursuit and argument of his interests. The committee has derived much information from his research. But beyond the obligation thus far conferred no other exists.

I have spoken on this question with some earnestness, only because of my convictions of right and of duty. As chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, to whom this question was referred, it became my duty to give the subject the fullest investigation. I have done that conscientiously for nearly a whole year. I have given the House the result of my labors. If it will enable it to come to an intelligent conclusion, my whole duty will have been performed and my work ended. It has been an interesting and fascinating study; but I cannot help but admit that I am glad it is now done.

Before taking my seat I wish to say in justice to the gentlemen of the committee and to myself, but above all, to the memory of the gentleman whose remains but recently left this Hall to go to his late home in Savannah, followed by the sincere regret of us all, that there are several expressions in the minority report for which I am solely accountable, but for which other gentlemen have been held responsible on this floor, and for the inadvertent use of which I am sorry. They are expressions which, when my attention was called to them, I saw at once were capable of being construed as a reflection upon the sincerity of members of the majority of the committee in advocating a bill to send these claims to a court as an impartial bill.

I want to say here, and I say it of my own accord, as gentlemen of the committee know, and I say it in justice to them and to myself, that whatever gentlemen may have construed into any reflection upon them was written not only in the heat of discussion, but in the hasty preparation of a long and elaborate report which had to be prepared for the printer within three or four days. The nature of the criticism was not apparent to me until my attention was called to it by the gentleman from Georgia to whom I have referred. I desire to say, (as I then said to my friend,) that I did not then intend, nor do I now, to reflect upon the honesty or sincerity of the opinion of any member of the committee. Too many good lawyers have differed upon this question to justify the suspicion of any view he may hold. And where so many able jurists and distinguished statesmen have ranged themselves on either side, I feel more like distrusting my own judgment than calling in question the opinion of others.

Mr. KNOTT. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. Lest the gentleman from Kentucky should proceed under a misunderstanding the Chair deems it proper to say that after the previous question is ordered he will not be entitled to speak for more than an hour.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that unanimous consent be now given that the gentleman from Kentucky shall have as much time as he chooses to occupy.

Mr. GARFIELD. The main question might be ordered now, and thereafter such time might be allowed to the gentleman from Kentucky as he desires.

The SPEAKER. The request is made that the gentleman from Kentucky shall have the time necessary beyond the hour to say what he may desire on the subject.

There was no objection.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire before the vote is taken on the demand for the previous question to prefer a request on behalf of my distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who was not here in time to avail himself of his hour and who now desires ten or fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. To come out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman does not desire to conflict with my time. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, having examined this question in the course of public duty very fully and made two reports upon it as chairman of the committee of which I have the honor now to be a member, I have deemed it my duty to ask a few moments in which to state the position of the question, so far as I understand it comes up in the amendments and in the bill.

By the proper exercise of belligerent rights the confederate authorities fitted out certain steamers to annoy the commerce of the other belligerents of the United States. That was legitimate warfare and of that no complaint has been or can well be made. But a neutral nation who were enjoying an accretion of their commercial marine greater than they ever had before because of our state of controversy, wanting to increase that marine aided in that warfare illegitimately and improperly; and for the injury done to the country and for the wrong done that nation did to us what it never did before, made a public humble apology of regret. That satisfied the national honor. They then said, "We will pay to the United States such an amount of pecuniary compensation as will satisfy the wrongs done to the nation." They did not make any private apology, any apology to private citizens, but they made an apology to the nation. They made no provision for the payment of any class of private citizens wronged, but they made a provision for the payment of national losses which fell more or less directly and indirectly upon private citizens. Before this in the Johnson-Clarendon treaty they had made a proposition to pay private citizens for private losses and that had been rejected by the United States Senate as you remember; the nation saying, "No, we will take nothing less than an apology to the national honor and the payment of national claims."

The case went before the tribunal, and that tribunal decided to pay only national losses. The question was whether certain indirect losses, national losses, should be paid, and this question came very nearly wrecking that tribunal, but the good sense of the two countries removed this difficulty, and it was finally agreed that national claims, and they only, should be submitted. While the matter was in fieri before the tribunal it was whispered around that one of the counsel of the United States was the retained counsel of the insurance companies. Whether that rumor was right or wrong it is not necessary to consider, but the effect was to bring from the State Department a peremptory order to its counsel and agents not to allow the tribunal at Geneva to make any disposition whatever in regard to several classes of claims which should be paid; if they gave a judgment for a sum in block; but if they took into consideration the particular ships as they might do, then of course they would settle that question as regarded each particular ship that was destroyed or in the case of which loss was incurred. The tribunal came to the conclusion under those instructions to award a sum in block that covered everything.

Now, then, that money, in my judgment, belongs to the United States without any trust, any legal duty or any claim of any class of citizens whatever, to be disposed of precisely as the United States pleases, as a man may do with his own property. But there came a difficulty in the mean time, when we had come together after the close of our late unfortunate war, and it was not thought well by the gentlemen who had before been in the confederacy, then in the House and Senate, that the money should remain in the Treasury of the United States, because for the reason among others that if it remained there the southern people would be sharing in the indemnity for wrongs which they had committed. Those high-spirited and honorable gentlemen chose not to be placed in that position. They had committed the wrong; we had not called on them for redress; we had got redress from another source and therefore it was said in the course of the discussion why we did not want any part of it. It was a part of the losses of the war that fell upon you and we will not call upon you to make those losses good. But if we have the money in the Treasury to make them good from any other source that money we do not want.

Now there are three propositions to be taken into consideration: one is to put this money into the Treasury. I do not believe there is a southern gentleman on this floor who would vote for that proposition after having inflicted that wrong rightly, so far as that war can have any element of right, no one of you wants to have any advantage from the money obtained from our neutral friend for losses due to wrongs committed by him, his aid in that wrong. Therefore the proposition to put the money into the Treasury never has commanded, so far as I know, any considerable vote from the gentlemen who represent upon this floor the confederacy part of our Union.

The other proposition is to give it to somebody. All of us, including the learned gentleman who is to close this debate, agree that it is to be given by the United States to somebody. To whom shall it be given as an indemnity? Nobody has any legal right to it. We have a right to do anything we please, to make Mississippi levees or northern railroads, to give subsidies to lines of ships, if we choose, as we will.

But what ought to be done with it is to indemnify somebody who has lost.

Now, the next proposition is to give it to the insurance companies or to give them some rights to get into the courts with their claims or set up what they seek as claims of subrogation, but when they have no legal right to it, because the premiums or matter of insurance of the property had nothing to do with it.

Now they do not claim any right to it because premiums are the mother of insurance. The property has nothing to do with insurance. Now, these gentlemen of the insurance companies have received nearly nine million dollars' worth of premiums during the war, and they have paid out only about $5,500,000 of losses; therefore they have lost nothing. That is the condition of things precisely. Not only that, but in a bill which I had the honor to draw, and which passed the House and the Senate and became a law, a provision was made that if in pursuance of any insurance in any business, upon reckoning up that business, it was found that any individual company upon profit and loss account in its business had sustained a loss, it should be paid; and all the insurance companies of the United States that can show that they have sustained a loss in the business during the war have gone before the tribunal before constituted and received their pay.

Now, who is there here that thinks there is any equitable claim on the part of the insurance companies? Clearly, none. Now, have they any legal claim? Their legal claim states itself in this way: they say when we insure the law of insurance is that when we pay the loss on a ship, so long as there is a plank in that ship above water just so long we own that plank as our property, and we are subrogated, having paid the loss, to all the rights of the ship's owner in that property. True, very true; there can be no truer principle in the law of insurance than that.

But how is it when there is not a plank above water? Have you any legal title to anything then? How is it when there was no claim existing on earth that any private individual could prosecute against any foreign nation? I suppose no man will dispute this proposition of public law: that no private citizen can maintain a claim against a foreign government as a matter of right for anything done by that foreign government. He must go through his government if he goes at all.

Therefore there is nothing to be subrogated to; there is nothing to which their right, if they have one, can attach. There is nothing whatever upon which they can found a legal claim of right. There has been a decision in England of a case carried to the privy council on a petition of right. If time would permit me I would like to go over that case. But I have stated the effect of it, and my learned friend will agree fully that I have given the whole effect. Therefore they have no legal claim.

It is difficult to see where the equitable claim comes from, for the reasons I have before stated. They made four millions of dollars. Are they to make four millions more?

Now, who are the war-premium men? They are a class of men who paid premiums and who have got no return for those premiums. They were obliged to pay 10 per cent. insurance in order to get their ships across the water in the course of business. So great was this burden that many men sold their ships, nominally or actually, to citizens of Great Britain, to be sailed under the British flag. But there were other men who with true patriotism carried on their business and paid the war premium, and have not received a dollar return in any way from the insurance companies or from anybody else.

These were direct losses to their property, unless the answer is true which is this: all that is true, but the merchant and the ship-owner charged the amount of his war premium paid into the prices of the goods he sold, and therefore he has collected it back from the whole people. That is a fair argument and is to be fairly considered.

Now, what is the fact in regard to that? It could have been done so except for the reason that four-fifths of all the commerce of the United States during the war was carried on in foreign bottoms. Now, which fixed the price of the goods, the four-fifths or the one-fifth? The one-fifth was carried on under war premiums; four-fifths was carried on in foreign bottoms that paid no premiums. It was the four-fifths that fixed the price, and therefore the men who paid war premiums could not charge them back into their goods, and so raise the price of those goods as to obtain indemnity. So much for that.

But it was not a question between the merchant who sold the goods to the people, but it was a question between the American ship-owner, the man who owned the ships and had them in the East Indies, for instance, and was asking for freight. Here was a ship at Hong-Kong, a British ship alongside of an American ship. The British ship had come safe against all war risks, and the man who shipped on her would sell his tea at a profit so far as the war was concerned. If he put his tea on board of an American ship, even if the American ship paid the war premium in order to get the freight, all that he would get back would be the simple cost of the tea; he would lose all his profit. All our ship-owners had to do business with that burden upon them. It was a direct and positive loss of so many millions of dollars. There is about $7,000,000, I think, uncovered by anything like remuneration from the insurance company; seven or eight millions of dollars of absolute loss to the freighter, to the ship-owner, to the ship-master, who had to pay this war premium in order to obtain his freight.

Now they come before Congress and say to us, "Here is this sum of money for you to do with as you see fit. Let us have the opportunity of going before a proper court for its distribution." These men are somewhat indifferent as to whether it shall be the Court of Claims or some other court. But they ask that they may be given that to which they shall show they are justly entitled.

Now, you do not want the money in the Treasury. You will not admit to England that you cheated her out of six or seven millions more at Geneva than you ought to have had. Yet that is what you will do if you do not give this money to somebody; and it should go to the war-premium men.

Now that is the principle of the minority report, which has three times passed this House by an overwhelming vote; twice when this House was republican, and once when it was democratic largely, much more so than it is now. Therefore there is no party consideration in this matter.

Then, there is another class of claimants, and those claimants are claimants for losses by what is called the unInculpated cruisers. That is, under certain new rules of international law which we laid down in the treaty of Washington, and which we said should govern us hereafter, as I think wisely, certain cruisers were to be known as exculpated cruisers. I think we shall find trouble with those rules whenever we become a neutral nation, as between two belligerents. We said we would have certain new rules; we made those new rules. Under those rules, which were narrowing public law, there were certain cruisers which took our property, which could not be held liable by the judgment of the tribunal.

Now, I have no quarrel with the judgment of the tribunal under rules which we made in the treaty. But it left unreimbursed a portion of our property actually destroyed. Having enough money to cover those claims, the minority of the committee say why should not we, whose duty it was to have protected this property on the high seas, pay these men who in good faith prosecuted their voyages and who were captured by the cruisers of the confederacy, as they had a right to capture them under the laws of war? But the men who were captured also had a right to be protected by the power of the United States.

The United States, failing in that power of protection, why should we not remunerate these men from this fund so far as it will go? Let us take this fund out of the Treasury to make compensation for private property taken for public uses (although not directly yet in fact) by reason of the exigencies of war.

This claim, with one other, is the only question growing out of the war that will ever be presented by the North. Being such a claim, the question is whether you of the opposite section will deal with it precisely as you would desire that your claim should be dealt with by us; and if we of this section have done any wrong in that regard, it is now your turn to "heap coals of fire upon our heads."

Mr. KNOTT. I think I can safely affirm, Mr. Speaker, that the position I occupy with regard to the matter under consideration is one of absolute impartiality. I have not a solitary constituent who pretends to have any more claim upon any portion of the sum awarded by the tribunal at Geneva than he has to a diamond mine on the far side of the moon, and I am sure that I have not the slightest scintilla of feeling or prejudice for or against any particular claimant or class of claimants to any portion of that fund. The only solicitude I have in relation to anything in anywise connected with it is, that simple justice may be done, and that such steps may be taken here as will insure the speediest practicable distribution of the remainder of the sum now in the hands of the Government among those to whom it really belongs, no matter who they may be or by what circumstances they may be surrounded.

I am therefore under no temptation to discuss with the zeal of an advocate the merits of any claim upon which it may possibly become my duty to vote as a judge. All that I desire is that gentlemen who have not had an opportunity of investigating the subject as fully and carefully as I have myself may have a distinct understanding of the propositions upon which they are now called upon to vote, and may be sufficiently advised as to the facts which are necessary to be understood in order to vote intelligently thereon. Those facts are very few and simple, sir, and if the House will favor me with its patient attention while I attempt to eliminate them from the mass of irrelevant and superfluous matter which has been brought into this discussion, I will endeavor to requite that distinguished courtesy by such brevity and clearness as I shall be able to command; though to those who had the good fortune to hear or who have read the brief but singularly lucid argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BICKNELL] it may perhaps seem like a work of supererogation on my part to undertake to do so at all.

I deem it entirely unnecessary, however, that I should enter into anything like a detailed statement of the familiar facts which gave rise to the treaty of Washington, concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 8th of May, 1871. Nor will I abuse the patience of the House by referring to any transaction of the tribunal of arbitration organized under the provisions of that treaty which does not have an immediate bearing upon the questions under consideration. It is sufficient, perhaps, to state in general terms that according to the stipulations of the treaty it was made the duty of the tribunal thus organized to carefully and impartially examine and decide all questions submitted to it by the two governments respectively, and especially to determine whether Great Britain by any act or omission had failed to fulfill any duty prescribed in three rules which had been agreed upon in the treaty or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent therewith; and, if so, to certify that fact and the particular vessel or vessels with respect to which such dereliction had occurred. And in case the tribunal should find that Great Britain had been thus derelict it was authorized, if it should think proper, to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States, in satisfaction of the damages resulting from such dereliction.

The tribunal contemplated in the treaty having met and organized at the place agreed upon, the United States presented their "case," claiming that Great Britain should be held responsible for the transactions of the Florida, Alabama, Georgia, Nashville, Tallahassee, Tuscaloosa, Chickamauga, Shanandoah, Retribution, and some other vessels perhaps whose names I cannot at this moment recall, and exhibiting a detailed statement of all the claims for losses of vessels and cargoes captured and destroyed by those vessels, which had come to the knowledge of our Government; showing the cruiser which did the injury in each instance, the vessels destroyed, the names of the claimants of such vessels and cargoes, the amount of insurance on each, and all other facts necessary to enable the tribunal to determine the amount of injury committed by each cruiser and who were the sufferers thereby.

In addition to these specific individual claims for direct losses, the United States demanded indemnity for losses occasioned by the presence of the confederate cruisers on the high seas, and resulting from the transfer of a large portion of the American commercial marine to the British flag; the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war, and the payment of enhanced rates of insurance popularly known as "war premiums." This demand, however, was instantly met by such a decided and, I may say, indignant opposition on the part of Great Britain that all prospect of a settlement of the differences between the two governments seemed utterly out of the question if such claims were to be insisted upon. The tribunal therefore announced:

> That after the most careful perusal of all that had been urged on the part of the United States in respect to these claims, they had arrived; individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims did not constitute, upon principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation, or computation of damages between nations, and should upon such principles—> be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there had been no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

That is, principles of international law—

This conclusion, which I have read in the very language of the arbitrators themselves, on being communicated to the President of the United States met his entire approbation, and he accordingly authorized the announcement to be made to the tribunal that all claims for indemnity on account of the transfer of American commercial marine to the British flag, the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war, and the payment of "war premiums" would be no further insisted upon by the United States, but might be wholly excluded from their consideration by the arbitrators in making their award; and upon this announcement being made the tribunal directed it to be entered as its solemn judgment that such claims should from thenceforth be wholly excluded from its consideration, so they really cut no more figure in the subsequent proceedings or conclusions of the tribunal than if they had never been mentioned, or even thought of.

The truth is, sir, that these claims were not presented with any expectation or desire on the part of the executive department of our Government that a pecuniary award would be made upon any such grounds. They were exhibited simply and solely with the view of eliciting the opinion of the tribunal upon a question of international law of far more importance to the United States as a neutral power than all the gold in the British exchequer. In proof of this I need only refer to the following telegram from Mr. Secretary Fish in reply to Mr. Bancroft Davis, the agent of the United States at Geneva, of date June 22, 1872:

> I have laid your telegram before the President, who directs me to say that he accepts the declaration of the tribunal as its judgment upon a question of public law which he had felt that the interest of both governments required should be decided, and for the determination of which he had felt it important to present the claims referred to for the purpose of taking the opinion of the tribunal. This is the attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary award, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of neutrals for claims of that character. The President, therefore, further accepts the opinion and advice of the counsel as set forth above, and authorizes the announcement to the tribunal that he accepts their declaration as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law upon which he felt it his duty to seek the expression of their opinion, and that in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth, he regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payments of insurance, and the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion as adjudicated and disposed of; and that, consequently, they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award.—Papers, vol. 2, p. 579.

It is unnecessary that I should linger upon the details of the proceedings of the tribunal after its unanimous judgment excluding these claims finally and forever from its consideration, nor need I pause here to show that that judgment was of infinitely greater consequence to the United States than ten times the sum subsequently awarded would have been. Suffice it to say, sir, the arbitrators finally determined that the indemnity to which the United States were entitled was limited to losses resulting directly from the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the Alabama, the Florida, and their tenders, and the Shenandoah after her departure from the port of Melbourne on the 18th of February, 1865; and inasmuch as the reference of the subject of compensation to another tribunal composed of members of different nationalities, as contemplated in article 10 of the treaty, for further discussion and deliberation, might lead to disagreements, difficulties, delays, and unnecessary expenses, if not to ultimate injustice and wrong, and in view of the fact that they had before them the necessary data to enable them to approximate such gross sum as would be a full compensation for the injuries for which they had determined that Great Britain should be held liable, they proceeded, in exercise of the discretion vested in them, to award "the sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformable to the provisions of article 7 of the treaty of Washington."

That I have thus far, Mr. Speaker, presented a candid and impartial statement of the facts material to be understood and borne in mind in this discussion cannot be denied by any one who has made a careful and dispassionate examination of the whole subject, as I have endeavored to do myself; and from that simple recital, sir, it must be obvious that the Georgia, the Nashville, the Retribution, and other confederate cruisers might have swept our entire commercial marine from the face of the seas; every merchant and ship-owner in the land might have been rendered bankrupt by the payment of enhanced rates of insurance, yet had the Florida and the Alabama or their tenders never captured or destroyed a vessel, and had the Shenandoah never entered or never left the port of Melbourne, all the learning and eloquence which have been expended in this debate in behalf of those who paid war premiums or those who suffered directly from the operations of the so-called exculpated cruisers would have been lost forever to this House and to the world, simply because it is absolutely certain that the United States would never have received a solitary cent to be distributed to them or anybody else. On the other hand, it is equally obvious to every unprejudiced mind that the sum awarded was intended simply and solely as a compensation for losses occasioned directly by the operations of the three inculpated cruisers—the Florida, the Alabama, and their tenders, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne—and for no others whatever.

That such was the ultimate conclusion of the Forty-third Congress, whatever may be asserted to the contrary, is manifest from the provisions of the act of June 24, 1874, creating the special tribunal known as the "court of commissioners of Alabama claims," by which the jurisdiction of that court was expressly limited to claims resulting directly from the destruction of vessels and cargoes by these three cruisers and their tenders, as gentlemen will see by referring to the act.

By the court organized in pursuance of the provisions of that act, circumscribed by the limitations and restrictions therein contained, claims were allowed and have been paid out of the gross sum awarded by the Geneva tribunal, amounting to something over $6,000,000, leaving a balance of near $10,000,000 yet in the hands of the Government and undisposed of.

To that remainder, sir, there appear to be several classes of claimants: first, the owners of vessels and cargoes destroyed by the Alabama, the Florida, and their tenders, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, who claim that they have not been fully remunerated under the act of June 24, 1874; second, the owners of vessels and cargoes destroyed by the Georgia, Sumter, Nashville, Tallahassee, Chickamauga, Sallie, Jefferson Davis, Music, Boston, V. H. Joy, and the Shenandoah before she arrived at Melbourne, familiarly known as the "exculpated cruisers;" third, those who claim to have paid enhanced rates of insurance, commonly known as "war premiums," in consequence of the presence of the confederate cruisers on the high seas; and, fourth, the insurers, who claim to have paid the owners of certain vessels destroyed by the inculpated cruisers the losses thus sustained by them, and ask to be subrogated to the rights of the insured to the extent of the losses so paid.

Now, sir, with these facts clearly and constantly in view, gentlemen may proceed to consider intelligently the two propositions now before the House. The one presented by the substitute proposed by the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary is that Congress shall assume a function belonging properly to the judicial department of the Government, and solemnly adjudge that the remainder of this fund shall be distributed among those embraced in the first three classes I have enumerated, notwithstanding the minority themselves say, as I will presently show, that none of those claimants have a legal or equitable right to a solitary cent of it, and that those belonging to the fourth class shall receive nothing at all, and that a board of audit shall be organized to carry out that decree.

On the other hand the bill reported by the committee proposes to make no discrimination among these parties whatever. It does not undertake to determine the title, or to decide the intricate questions of fact, or the delicate principles of law involved in favor of or against any one, but proposes to give every claimant to any portion of this fund, no matter to which class he may belong, or what the nature of his claim may be, a full, fair, and equal chance to manifest his right by regular proceedings in one of the established courts of the country, with the privilege secured to the Government, as well as the claimant, of appealing to the highest tribunal known to our Constitution and laws, in the event of a supposed injustice or mistake.

Such, sir, is the pith and substance of the two conflicting propositions between which this House is now called upon to choose. The one—to use the mildest terms—a mere act of congressional grace; the other, of impartial, even-handed justice. The one presenting in their most odious forms all the most objectionable features of "class legislation," as dangerous in practice as it is indefensible in principle; the other a fulfillment of the sacred guarantee in our bill of rights that no person, high or low, rich or poor, shall be deprived of his property without due process of law—the most priceless, sir, of all the crown jewels that glitter in the diadem of American liberty. Certainly, sir, a graver or a more interesting question could scarcely be presented for the serious consideration of this honorable body, involving, as it does, not only the disposition to be made of millions of dollars, but the integrity of the American Government, and the private rights of a large number of American citizens, all equally entitled to justice and protection under the broad ægis of the American Constitution.

Let us therefore examine the merits claimed for these propositions respectively through the calm, clear medium of unprejudiced, dispassionate reason.

The plan proposed in the substitute offered by the minority, sir, is obnoxious to many and, to my mind, insuperable objections. It bristles all over with difficulties. We are met at the very threshold by a grave and important question as to the nature of the fund itself upon which the most enlightened legal minds in the country are divided. Here we find the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House boldly and confidently asserting that it belongs absolutely to the United States in their corporate capacity, discharged of every feature and attribute of a trust, while on the other hand there are those, endowed with less ability, and equipped with less learning perhaps, yet who, after as much laborious and impartial research, as honestly believe that the Government holds it in the capacity of a trustee for certain persons to whom it legally and justly belongs. The gentlemen of the minority contend with great zeal and ability that Congress has an unlimited discretion with regard to it and may give it away to whomsoever it may see proper, while there are others who maintain that the Government holds it under a moral obligation to provide for its speedy distribution among those upon whose losses it was assessed, for whose indemnity it was intended, and to whom it really belongs according to the broad principles of natural justice and enlightened equity. Yet, sir, permit me to ask how many gentlemen upon this floor have found the time, amid the multitude of other duties demanding their attention, to explore this question in all its intricacies with such care as to enable them to form an intelligent and independent opinion of their own with regard to it?

The majority of the committee, sir, conscious of their own liability to err, but without presuming to challenge the infallibility of their learned colleagues of the minority, have not asked the House to adopt their opinion upon this great underlying question or to be influenced by it in any manner whatever. They did not undertake to decide it themselves nor do they ask you to decide it. On the contrary, they have sought, by the bill which they have reported, to relieve the House entirely of that onerous and disagreeable duty, by remitting the whole subject to a forum to which it properly belongs and where it can be investigated with that deliberation and determined with that impartiality and precision which its importance demands.

But, sir, the minority not only ask the House to assume that their opinion as to the nature of this fund is the correct one, that is, that it belongs absolutely to the United States, but that it should be distributed among certain parties who, they say themselves, have no legal or equitable right to any portion of it whatever. To show that I do not state this startling and anomalous position too strongly, I beg leave to call attention to the exact language employed by them in their printed views, at page 26. They say:

> The undersigned are of the opinion that the fund in question is an indemnity fund. They believe it was awarded to us as a nation. They believe that no person or corporation has a legal or equitable right to any portion of it. They regard it as a fund for actual sufferers by the conduct of Great Britain.

There, sir, is the most remarkable creed to be found in any language ancient or modern, living or dead. A creed expressed in four brief, crisp sentences, in which there are two distinct and sharply defined changes of faith. First it is an indemnity fund. Then it is a fund to which no person or corporation has any legal or equitable right whatever. And then it changes again to a fund for the actual sufferers by the conduct of Great Britain. And then again those actual sufferers have no legal or equitable right to any portion of it.

> Can such things be,
> And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
> Without our special wonder?

I once heard of a man who changed front so often and so quickly that it was impossible to tell whether he wore his breastpin in his shirt bosom or between his shoulder-blades, but I never believed it, sir, until I read this rapid succession of inconsistent conclusions, following each other like the ever-varying hues of the aurora borealis,

> Which flit ere you can point the place.

Why, sir, old Polonius himself could scarcely have changed his opinions with such celerity.

"Do you see yonder cloud, that's almost in shape of a camel?" demands the melancholy Dane. "By the mass," exclaims the garrulous old chamberlain "and 'tis like a camel indeed." "Methinks, it is like a weasel," adds the prince. "It is backed like a weasel," admits the cunning old courtier. "Or, like a whale," suggests Hamlet. "Very like a whale," echoes the complaisant old sycophant.

But, sir, the language I have read from the printed "views" of the minority was not one of the accidental inaccuracies of a hurried or ill-considered debate. It was conceived in the calm deliberation of the closet by a cool brain and penned by a steady hand. It was intended and has been harped upon as the key-note of the entire argument in favor of the substitute offered by the minority. I propose, therefore, to analyze it a little more narrowly.

I will first state, however, what will be admitted as a self-evident truth by every gentleman on this floor, lawyer or layman, except perhaps the advocates of the substitute proposed by the minority, and that is that this fund either belongs to the United States or it does not. If it belongs absolutely to the United States, as the minority assert, they are correct in saying that "no person or corporation has any legal or equitable right to any portion of it," for no person can have a legal or equitable right to that which belongs absolutely to another; or, if he can, our laws against trespass, embezzlement, larceny, and highway robbery are not only superfluous but unjust and despotic. If, on the other hand, this fund does not belong to the United States, the Government cannot withhold it from the rightful owner, no matter who that owner may be, without violating the most familiar injunction of the decalogue as well as the plainest provision in our bill of rights.

Now, sir, if this fund does really belong absolutely to the United States, and no person or corporation has a legal or equitable right to any portion of it, as the minority so broadly and boldly assert, I would like to inquire by what right any portion of it can be claimed for one who has paid a "war premium" upon his vessel or cargo, or who may have had his property destroyed by a confederate cruiser either "inculpated" or "exculpated?" In what code of law or under what system of equity have the gentlemen found this new and anomalous principle which authorizes a man to claim that to which he has no right either in law or equity, but which belongs absolutely to another? The Pilgrim Fathers I believe took possession of this continent in the name of the Lord, upon the ground that "the earth was the Lord's and the fullness thereof." They only proposed to occupy it until the Lord should come along and demand his property. But it is not pretended that these claimants, who have no right of their own, can demand this fund even as trustees of the Lord. Why, then, should it be claimed for them at all? They may beg it as an alms, I grant you, but they can never demand it as a right.

And this, sir, when the naked truth is told, is after all the real grounds upon which the substitute is based. The gentlemen who propose it say, in effect: "It is true that this fund belongs absolutely to the United States; it is true that those who paid war premiums or suffered by the acts of the 'exculpated cruisers' have no legal or equitable right to any portion of it, yet Congress has an unlimited discretion with regard to it and can do whatsoever it pleases with the money. Let us therefore give it to these claimants 'for sweet charity's sake.'" But, sir, I most earnestly and emphatically deny that Congress has any such discretion, either under the Constitution or in good morals. Congress may violate the Constitution, it is true, as I fear it too frequently does, by appropriating the public moneys to purposes unauthorized or forbidden by the fundamental law of the land. Ay, sir, it may do even more than this. It may outrage every principle of common justice, and trample in the dust the plainest mandates of morality by withholding money which may be in the hands of the Government from its rightful owners; or, what is more reprehensible still, it may direct the payment of such money to those who have no legal or equitable right to any portion of it. Yes, sir, it may do all this, and more, by dint of mere brute power. But if my learned colleague from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] who drafted this substitute, and who has advocated its adoption with such ingenuity and zeal, had studied the Constitution of his country with half the assiduity he seems to have devoted to the case of Rustomjee against the Queen of England, or the opinions of Mr. Gladstone, he would have discovered that this Government was instituted "to establish justice," and not to dispense gratuities. He would have found that Congress has the power "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," but no provision anywhere authorizing it to peddle favors or dole out charities.

But, sir, suppose we admit, for the sake of the argument, that the gentlemen are correct. Suppose we admit that there is no limitation, either moral or legal, upon congressional discretion with regard to this fund. Suppose we admit that Congress is the mere hospital for crippled fortunes the proposition and the argument of the gentleman would make it. Suppose we admit that the public money may be distributed around ex gratia among those who have no legal or equitable right to any portion of it; that it may be dispensed in tender charity to the pleading pensioners upon public pity provided for in the substitute. Suppose we grant all this, are there not other and equally as meritorious objects of governmental bounty appealing fully as justly, if not so piteously, to congressional compassion? If this money belongs absolutely to the United States, if it is true, as the gentlemen of the minority assert, that none of these claimants have any legal or equitable right to any portion of it, why give it to them at all? Or, if it must be given away, why not use it in the erection and maintenance of homes for the thousands of maimed and needy veterans, who, with nothing to shield them from the pitiless blasts of poverty and want, are slowly dragging their mutilated and hungry forms toward the more hospitable shelter of the tomb? Why not dedicate it to the education of the myriads of poverty-stricken orphans whose fathers sleep their last long sleep in the unmarked graves of the far-off battle-field? True they have "no legal nor equitable right to any portion of it;" but if the minority are correct, neither has the merchant prince who paid war premiums to protect his wealth, nor the ship-owner whose vessel, sharing the common casualties of public war, was destroyed by the confederate cruisers? When these inquiries are answered satisfactorily, it will be time enough for this House to consider whether it will prefer charity to justice.

"Ah, but," say the minority, "this is an indemnity fund." Indeed! An indemnity fund out of which no one has a legal or equitable right to claim indemnity! That is very strange. But pray, sir, if this is an indemnity fund, who were intended to be indemnified by it? Upon what losses was it computed, and for whose compensation was it paid? Who here is prepared to answer these questions as a judge under his oath?

The war-premium claimant says: "It is mine. In consequence of the presence of the confederate cruisers upon the high seas I chose to pay several thousand dollars more than I would otherwise have been obliged to pay rather than bear the risk of losing the entire value of my ship and cargo. It was therefore intended to indemnify me, notwithstanding my loss was totally excluded from all consideration, and not taken into the account at all when the sum was computed by the arbitrators."

The owner of a vessel destroyed by one of the exculpated cruisers says: "It was intended to indemnify me, although Great Britain was held in no wise responsible to me or any one else for the acts of the cruiser by which my property was committed to the flames or sent to the bottom of the ocean;" while the underwriter says: "I contracted in good faith with the owners of certain vessels and cargoes that in consideration of certain sums paid me I would pay them certain sums in case their vessels and cargoes should be lost or destroyed, with the understanding, however, that to the extent of the sums paid by me whatever might be recovered from or on account of the wreck should be mine. Those vessels and cargoes were destroyed by the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne. I paid those owners every cent I agreed to pay them. What would otherwise have been their losses became my own. The Government invited me to present my claim and undertook to collect it for me. I did so, and the Government was successful in its demand upon Great Britain. To that extent, therefore, this fund should be mine."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask in all seriousness, how many of the gentlemen I see around me are willing to say that these conflicting claims should not be settled one way or the other, finally and forever? Yet how many of them can truly and conscientiously say that they are prepared to decide upon them with the accuracy, impartiality, and justice with which they would have the matter determined if they stood here in the attitude of any honest claimant to any portion of this fund, no matter to which class he may belong?

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] may think that he is prepared to do so; for he told us in the very able and eloquent remarks he submitted upon this subject some time ago that he had made it the subject of profoundest study for the last six years or more; but is he quite certain, sir, that he can poise the scales of justice in this instance with a perfectly steady and even hand? Is he sure that he could decide between the conflicting interests involved in this matter as coolly, calmly, and dispassionately as he could if his own constituents were not clamoring for several millions of this very money? Is he satisfied that notwithstanding all his eloquent vituperation and vociferous denunciation of the insurance companies he can mete out to them their full measure of impartial justice? Does he think that he could pass upon their claims with that degree of judicial fairness that he would ask of a judge or juror in a case in which he himself had a direct personal or pecuniary interest? He may be capable of doing so, and I am sure he thinks he is, or he would be the very last man on this floor to undertake it; for a long and intimate acquaintance with him has satisfied me that he is as honest a gentleman as breathes. But who of us has devoted six hours to the earnest, candid investigation of this subject, much less six long years of laborious study as he has?

Sir, I am sadly mistaken in the character of the materials of which this honorable body is composed if there is a solitary gentleman on this floor who would take it upon himself to determine a dispute between two conflicting claimants to the paltry sum of $10 unless he was fully advised, by competent evidence, of all the material facts, and felt certain that he fully comprehended the principles of law involved in the controversy. No, sir, there is not a gentleman in this House who would not positively and peremptorily refuse to decide a controversy involving the pitiful sum of ten shillings simply upon hearsay testimony or the mere opinion of a heated advocate. Yet, sir, here is a sum amounting to $10,000,000, involving the property rights of a large number of American citizens and the honor of the Government itself, which this House is actually asked to guess off; for how many gentlemen here, who are to assume the functions of judges if this substitute shall pass, have toiled through the twelve or fifteen ponderous volumes of documents which relate to this subject in order to acquaint themselves with the facts in controversy? How many have made a critical analysis of the various legal questions involved, so as to be able to announce an intelligent opinion upon them, independent of the mere representations of others? How many of us have studied the opinions of Sir William E. Gladstone as carefully and diligently as my learned colleague from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON?] Sir, I ask gentlemen if this request to thus determine the intricate questions of fact and the delicate and important principles of law involved in this matter is not rather too great a demand upon their good nature and complaisance?

But, sir, it has been contended with singular earnestness and zeal that the claims embraced in the substitute should be paid out of this fund, notwithstanding they were excluded from all consideration by the arbitrators in making their award, simply because the Government presented them and declined to commit itself at Geneva as to the "mode" in which the gross sum should be distributed. I will not pause here, sir, to discuss what was meant by that word "mode," as used by Mr. Secretary Fish, or to show that no such committal was ever asked. I will not even say that such a proposition is an absurdity. But if I should assert here that, in case a guardian of five different wards should bring a suit against a single defendant in favor of each of them, recover a judgment in one of the cases and be nonsuited in the other four, a court of equity should compel him to distribute the amount recovered among the four who were nonsuited and give nothing to the one for whom the judgment was obtained, I should fear that the House would entertain some doubt either of my sanity or my sincerity.

But admitting this to be correct, it is a matter of profound regret, sir, that the gentlemen, in their zeal for those who paid enhanced rates of insurance, or whose property was destroyed by the "exculpated cruisers," totally forgot to make any provision whatever for the losses of those who were forced—sometimes, I am told, at immense sacrifices—to transfer their vessels to foreign flags in order to prevent their capture and destruction by the confederate cruisers; for, sir, it must be remembered that the very first demand made by our Government in the class of indirect claims was indemnity for losses resulting from the transfer of a large portion of the American commercial marine to the British flag, and that this claim was excluded along with and upon precisely the same grounds that the claim for war premiums was. Is it not a little singular, therefore, that this class of sufferers should have been so entirely overlooked by the gentlemen of the minority in preparing their substitute? Yet why should any discrimination have been made against them?

This question becomes the more perplexing, sir, the more we reflect upon the fact that at the beginning of the war over three-fourths of our carrying trade was carried on upon American bottoms, while at the close of the war over three-fourths of it was carried on upon foreign bottoms; and especially when we remember that in some instances, when the American ship-owner happened to be caught out where it was impossible for him to invoke the protection of the ungodly underwriter, he was compelled to sell his vessel to some British or other foreign purchaser at perhaps one-fourth of its actual value or take the chances of going to the bottom of the ocean before he could reach home. The question will recur, then, why the gentlemen have so totally neglected this class and thought only of the war-premium claimants who are not a particle more meritorious? Why, they have left it to be said of themselves with respect to these two classes of claimants, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated," notwithstanding their claims upon Government bounty stand on such an exact parity.

But again, sir, if it is true, as the gentlemen so broadly assert, that this money belongs absolutely to the United States, discharged of every feature and attribute of a trust, it is as much the property of one citizen as another; and it cannot be forgotten, sir, that the presence of the confederate cruisers upon the high seas added ten, ay twenty, times the amount of this entire award to the cost of the war, expenses for which we are still in debt and for which the people of Ohio and Kentucky in common with those of every other State in the Union are still taxed, and likely to be taxed until the present generation, insurers and insured, war-premium claimants and all, shall have mingled in common dust. It will be remembered too, sir, that our Government presented a claim and demanded indemnity for these additional expenses at the same time and in the same manner that it presented the claim for "war premiums," and that indemnity was refused in both cases upon precisely the same grounds.

I do not think, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that I shall envy the predicament in which my learned colleague from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] will find himself if he should be called upon by his constituents to explain why he was so swift to donate some $10,000,000, in which they had a common interest, to the merchants and ship-owners of the seaboard who saw proper to pay enhanced rates of insurance in order to save themselves from loss, and not reserve a cent to alleviate the burdens resting upon the people of his own and every other district throughout the Union. He will possibly find an additional difficulty in the fact that perhaps in ninety-nine cases in a hundred the person who paid the war premium added it to the price of his wares or the amount of his freights, and got it all back again, with a profit, from the consumer. I know it is claimed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that this was not done, and it may not have been in some isolated instances, but it will be very difficult to convince the honest yeomanry of my colleague's district, or my own, that either the merchant or the ship-owner carried on a losing business simply for amusement, especially during the war when the prices of everything the farmer or mechanic had to buy had reached almost fabulous proportions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having said all I propose to say with reference to the substitute, I beg leave to address myself very briefly to the merits of the bill. And what, sir, does the bill propose to do? To give any portion of this money to the insurance companies? Not one word of it. Does it propose to deprive those who may have paid war premiums or who suffered loss by any of the exculpated cruisers of the millionth part of a cent to which they may be entitled upon known principles of justice, equity, or law? Not a syllable of it, sir. If it did no gentleman could possibly oppose it with more vehemence and zeal than I would myself. I should consider myself as utterly unworthy to associate with the honorable gentlemen I see around me if I could consent to be instrumental in withholding from any man a solitary cent to which he is justly entitled.

On the contrary, sir, it simply proposes, as I have already said, and as was so clearly shown in the able argument of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING,] to remit all the intricate and perplexing questions connected with the entire subject and about which there seems to be such a contrariety of opinion upon this floor to a forum where they can be calmly, deliberately, and dispassionately considered by a regularly organized court, and there determined by disinterested and impartial judges according to the well-established principles of equity, justice, and international law, and not by the heated advocates of either party to the controversy. It proposes that the court shall be open to every possible claimant to any portion of the fund. No person or class of persons who pretend to have a claim upon it is excluded.

And now, sir, I ask if any conceivable plan for the final distribution of this money could possibly be fairer or more expedient than this? Can any one who pretends to have a just and honest claim to any portion of it offer any valid or reasonable objection to having his claim fairly adjudicated by an impartial tribunal of his country, especially when the amplest provision is made for the speediest possible determination of his right both in that court and the supreme court of appeals? Are the claimants of war premiums or the sufferers by the exculpated cruisers afraid of justice? Do they shrink from the fullest and fairest investigation of their claims before an unbiased court with the Supreme Court to correct any error, injustice, or mistake that may be committed to their prejudice? Will their advocates on this floor dare make such an admission for them here? No, sir; the doors of this court and of the Supreme Court are thrown open to all claimants alike, and if one who asks indemnity for "war premiums" or for injuries done by any of the confederate cruisers can there show that according to the broad principles of natural justice, equity, or the law of nations he is entitled to any portion of this fund he will certainly get it, and if they cannot show themselves thus entitled to it I ask if there is a gentleman here who is willing to say they ought to have it? On the contrary, the interests of the Government cannot possibly be endangered, for if upon a careful examination of the entire subject under the strong, clear lights of justice and equity it shall appear that the fund belongs absolutely to the United States the court will certainly so determine and give it to none of the claimants at all.

But again, Mr. Speaker, the bill reported by the committee is not only just in itself, but if there is any weight to be attached to legislative precedents, the principles upon which it proceeds will be found in exact harmony with the almost unbroken practice of Congress since the year 1827. You will find collated in the report of the committee eight instances in which the distribution of indemnity funds similar to the one in question has been remitted to independent tribunals with authority to decide upon the rights of the various claimants according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations, unembarrassed by any special legislation, discrimination for or against any particular individual or class. I was amazed to hear my distinguished colleague from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] attempt to evade the force of these precedents simply upon the grounds that the wrongs for which the indemnity in those cases was paid were committed when the United States was at peace; for, sir, how can that circumstance make any difference? Is not our Government as much bound to protect its citizens in the one condition as the other? Or is it only bound to shield him in the calm sunshine of peace, and may abandon him and all his interests in the hurricane of war?

And it is a remarkable fact, sir, that in all these cases we hear of no complaint of any fraud, unfairness, injustice, or even mistake, except in two instances, occurring in the adjudication of the fund awarded to the United States under the convention with China of November 8, 1858. One was the case of the Neva, in which the claims of certain underwriters were disallowed by the commissioners, but the claimants were by act of Congress allowed a rehearing before the Attorney-General, who reversed the decision of the commissioners, and payment was accorded them.

The other is the case of the bark Caldera, in which the commissioners made a deduction of 60 per cent. in the claims of the underwriters on account of the cargo, on the ground of a supposed prior damage by sea water, and the claimants were told that their acceptance of the 40 per cent. allowed them would not preclude a rehearing of their case here in Washington. Inasmuch, however, as the act of 1859, creating the commission, allowed no such rehearing, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, through Mr. CRAPO, of Massachusetts, on the 5th of March last, unanimously reported a bill for the relief of the parties precisely parallel in principle and almost exactly similar in detail to the one now under consideration, which passed this House without a division.

The first section of that bill provides that any person or corporation holding or making any claim upon the balance of the fund usually designated as the "Chinese indemnity fund," under the control of the Department of State of the United States and now unappropriated, for losses sustained by the plunder and destruction of the bark Caldera in the year 1854 and property on board of said vessel, may at any time within twelve months from the passage of the act commence proceedings in the United States Court of Claims against the United States in the same manner as other suits are brought pursuant to and in virtue of the statutes of the United States and the rules of said court; and that the court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such claim or demand according to the principles of justice and international law; while the second section makes provision that either party, plaintiff or defendant, may appeal from the judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court as in other cases. And now, sir, I would ask gentlemen who voted for that bill, or sat quietly by and saw it pass without uttering a syllable in opposition to its becoming a law, to place it side by side with the bill under consideration and point out the difference between them if they can, or show what possible objection can be urged against the one that does not apply with equal force to the other.

Again, sir, I would ask gentlemen to contrast the speedy and satisfactory adjustment of claims under the precedents to which I have alluded, with the history of the French spoliation claims, in which such frequent and persistent efforts were made for nearly three-quarters of a century to have rights of the claimants determined by congressional enactment, and which, after having elicited reports from forty-two committees, have at length sunk, at least temporarily, out of view, and then say, whether it would be just or wise to permit this fund to remain undisposed of for generations to come, a perpetual stigma to the honor and integrity of our Government. If it belongs to the Government let the courts so decide, and the Government keep it; if it belongs to others let them manifest their right to it by regular judicial proceedings, and take it. Let the controversy be determined one way or the other, finally and forever. Let us not have these corridors thronged with claimants to this fund, pouring the piteous tale of their wrongs into the ears of Congress for the next three-quarters of a century to come.

It has been suggested, however, sir, that the passage of this bill will contribute additional burdens to the already crowded docket of the Supreme Court; but suppose that to be true, shall this Government say to even the meanest of its citizens, "Our courts are too busy to hear your cause; they have not time to do you justice?" Shall it wave him off with the haughty petulence of Richard III when Buckingham demands the promised earldom and movables of Hereford: "Thou troublest me; I am not in the vein?"

But, sir, this objection is more specious than real. It is safe to say, that every question that can arise in relation to the right to this fund will be settled, if not in a single case, in two or three at the outside, and that the business of the Supreme Court will not be retarded by them half as much as the business of this House has already been by the discussion of the various measures which have been brought before it touching the distribution of this money. I believe, in fact, that the determination of all the questions which might arise in connection with this matter would not retard the general business of the Supreme Court to any appreciable extent whatever.

But, Mr. Speaker, the objection which has been most persistently and earnestly urged against this bill is, that if it should become a law the insurance companies will be certain to be subrogated to the rights of the insured, and be reimbursed for the losses they have paid. This is assumed as an absolute certainty in the printed views of the minority, and has been the burden of all the more declamatory speeches which have given a spice to this discussion. It was the apprehension of that hideous fact which twice brought the marvelous magnanimity of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] so conspicuously to the front.

Well, sir, how that may be I am sure I do not know, but there is one thing of which I am absolutely certain, and that is if the insurance companies do get any portion of this fund under the provisions of this bill, they will do so either because they are justly and legally entitled to it or because both the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States are so utterly depraved that they will adjudge it to them in total disregard of every principle of justice, equity, and law applicable to such cases. I am not particular which horn of this dilemma gentlemen may select. I give them their choice. Which will they take? There can be no dodging or evasion in the matter; they must take one or the other. Now, will they assert here in the face of this House and of the world that both of these courts, and one of them the highest known to our system of government at that, are so completely lost to every sentiment of common decency, so completely sunk in beastly depravity, that it can be predicted with absolute certainty that they will render a corrupt decision in favor of certain parties either from bribery or the sheer love of corruption for its own sake? Are gentlemen prepared to say that? If not, they must admit that if any portion of this fund shall be adjudged to the insurance companies it will be simply because they are justly entitled to it according to the plain principles of equity and right. But, admitting their right to the fund, will gentlemen say they ought not to have it? Sir, I know they will not. I would spurn with indignant scorn the slightest insinuation that there is a member on this floor base enough to get his own consent to withhold from any man a single cent to which he can show himself justly and lawfully entitled.

Sir, I do not stand here as the champion of any class of claimants, but as the humble advocate of justice. The insurance companies may be, for aught I know or care, the viewless, soulless, godless beings they have been represented. Yet, sir, they are composed of citizens of the United States who look, as you and I do, to the Constitution and laws of their country for protection. Shall they not have simple justice? Or shall we confiscate their property in defiance of the most cherished of all the guarantees in our bill of rights, and shut the doors of our courts in their faces, merely because they may have been successful in the prosecution of a perfectly honest business demanded by the exigencies of commerce, authorized by law, and encouraged by an enlightened spirit of enterprise? Shall this Government, the grandest, the freest, the proudest ever vouchsafed to man, after its sublime appeal to justice as the arbiter between nations, at Geneva, deny justice to its own citizens?

Sir, we cannot afford to do that. The vital principle of republican government is not to be found in the grandeur of its domain, the splendor of its possessions, the magnitude of its armies, or the strength of its navies, but in the popular confidence and affection inspired by the certainty with which it administers simple, impartial justice to its citizens. When it refuses justice to even its humblest citizens, it is to that citizen not a benefactor to be loved and revered, but a despotism to be loathed and despised, a delusion and a fraud which holds out the word of promise to the ear but breaks it to the hope.

I have now, sir, discharged my duty to the House with regard to this matter, humbly it is true, but honestly and faithfully, and what ever may be its action I shall be content.

Mr. HOUSE. I move to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. FRYE. I hope not.

Mr. CARLISLE. I think it is evident that we will not be able to dispose of this bill and pending amendments to-day. I therefore move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the effect of the motion to adjourn if carried. The effect will be to bring up this bill immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 46, noes not counted.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. HOUSE to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 42, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, to add to section 1 that which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

But in no case shall any claim be admitted or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee or otherwise in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of the court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses in respect to its or his war risks exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss. And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favor of any insurance company not lawfully existing, at the time of the loss, under the laws of some one of the United States.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 131, noes 50.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. KNOTT called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being 28 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now move that the bill as amended be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 78, noes 106.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CANNON of Illinois, and Mr. MILLS, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 47 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the pending motion?

The SPEAKER. It is to lay the bill as amended on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will that include the substitute reported by the minority of the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. That motion, if agreed to, will carry the bill and everything connected with it upon the table.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 95, nays 122, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—95.

Aiken,	Cox, Samuel S.	Hooker,	Randolph,
Atkins,	Culberson,	House,	Reagan,

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. MONEY. On this question I am paired with Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. If he were present, I would vote "no."

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to state that Mr. COVERT, of New York, who is indisposed, is paired with Mr. REILLY, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. My colleague, Mr. BELL, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. ELAM. I am paired with Governor HENDEE, of Vermont. If he were here, I would vote "ay."

Mr. CARLISLE. My colleague, Mr. MCKENZIE, is absent serving upon a committee of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I scarcely know how to vote on this question. In justice to an absent member, Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio, I desire to make a statement. It was understood by that gentleman, I think, that I was opposed both to the bill and amendments; that I was in favor of covering this money into the Treasury of the United States. A short time ago a telegram was received from him requesting me to pair with him on the majority bill; but leaving me at liberty to vote "no" on the substitute of the minority. I asked his colleague, Mr. MCMAHON, what I should do in this case. There seems to be a conflict of opinion in regard to it. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote for laying this bill on the table. As I am paired upon it and as it seems that no one knows positively how Mr. FINLEY would vote on this particular question, I decline to vote.

Mr. BRIDGES. On this question I am paired with Mr. WILLIS, of New York. If he were here, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. TUCKER. On all questions connected with this subject I am paired with Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If I were not paired, I would vote "ay" upon the pending motion. I desire also to state that my colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is paired with Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. If Mr. HUNTON were here I suppose he would vote "no."

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. On this question and on all others connected with this bill I am paired with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. On this question I am paired with Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware. If he were here, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I am paired with Mr. POWERS, of Maine, who is absent on committee duty, attending the remains of the late Mr. Schleicher, of Texas. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. KEIFER. I am paired on this question with Mr. MULLER, of New York, who is also absent on the committee attending the remains of Mr. Schleicher. If he were here, I should vote "ay" and he would vote "no."

Mr. CRAPO. My colleague, Mr. HARRIS, is absent attending the remains of the late Mr. Schleicher, of Texas, and is paired with Mr. GIDDINGS, of Texas. If present, my colleague would vote "no" and Mr. GIDDINGS would vote "ay."

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. PEDDIE, is paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. MARTIN. On this question Mr. PEDDIE would vote "no" and Mr. MARTIN "ay."

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I am paired with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. MCKINLEY. My colleagues, Mr. GARDNER and Mr. DICKEY, are paired.

Mr. HANNA. My colleague, Mr. HUNTER, is paired with my colleague, Mr. FULLER. Mr. HUNTER on this question would vote "no." I do not know how Mr. FULLER would vote.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. BANKS, is paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. FRANKLIN. My colleague, if here, would vote "no."

Mr. TIPTON. I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. ROBERTS. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. POTTER, who, I suppose, would, if here, vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the following substitute offered by Mr. MCMAHON, on behalf of the minority of the Judiciary Committee:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That an act approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," be, and the same hereby is, revived, re-enacted, and continued; all the provisions thereof to take effect from and after the approval of this act, except as changed or modified by this act.

SEC. 2. That the number of judges for said court shall be three; and the agreement of two of the judges shall be necessary to decide any question arising before said court.

SEC. 3. That the judges of the court hereby re-established shall convene and organize, in the city of Washington, as soon as practicable after their appointment; and the court so organized shall exist eighteen months; and all claims provable under this act shall be verified and filed with the clerk of said court within six months from its organization, or they shall be held to be waived and barred.

SEC. 4. That the first class shall be for claims described in section 11 of said original act not already adjudicated, and for claims directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers during the late rebellion, including vessels and cargoes attacked and taken on the high seas or pursued by them therefrom, although the loss or damage occurred within four miles of the shore.

In cases of the loss of a whaling-vessel and outfit, the court shall allow, in addition to the compensation provided for in the said original act, the sum of 10 per cent., in lieu of freight, upon the value of said vessel and outfit as found by said court.

And upon all judgments heretofore rendered under said act for the loss of a whaling-vessel and outfit, there shall be allowed the said sum of 10 per cent. upon the awards as made by the court, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from the day from which said original award bore interest until the date of payment.

The second class shall be for claims for additional interest upon judgments which have been awarded and decreed by the said court of Alabama claims under the said original act; such interest to be computed in each case from the time from which interest was allowed in the original judgments, at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum in addition thereto, to the time of payment, as hereinafter provided.

And upon all judgments to be hereafter rendered upon claims of the first class, as herein described, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, instead of 4, as provided in the original act.

The third class shall be for claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to the corporations, agents, or individuals, after the sailing of any confederate cruiser; in determining which it shall be the duty of the court to deduct any sum in any way received by or paid to the claimant in diminution of the amount paid for any such premium, so that the actual loss only shall be allowed.

SEC. 5. That the judgments rendered by said court under this act shall be paid in currency by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the sum of money paid to the United States pursuant to article 7 of the treaty of Washington, and accruing therefrom, not appropriated to claims heretofore proved and allowed under the provisions of said original act and the act extending the time for the filing of claims thereunder.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of said fund, without further adjudication by any court, the 10 per cent. upon whaling-vessels and their outfit, with interest, as provided in section 5 of this act, upon all awards heretofore made for their loss; and to pay in the same manner the sum of 2 per cent. per annum upon judgments which have been heretofore rendered by said court, to be computed, as provided in section 5 of this act, up to the time of payment; and, to enable him to make such payments, the Secretary of State is directed to furnish a certified statement to the Secretary of the Treasury from the files and records of the court in his possession.

SEC. 6. Judgments rendered in the first class shall be first paid, and as soon as entered. Payments shall be made in the second class before judgments in the third class. If the sum of money so unappropriated shall be insufficient to pay the claims of the second class in full, they shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the whole amount of such unappropriated sum after the payment of judgments in the first class; and the same rule shall be applied in the payment of judgments in the third class.

SEC. 7. No person shall be excluded from the provisions of this act by reason of his being born in any other country than one of the United States, if at the time he suffered the loss or damage provided for in this act he was residing in the United States and doing business therein, or was sailing under the protection of the flag of the United States.

SEC. 8. That all claims filed, or that may hereafter be filed, in said court in the name of one or more claimants, relating to a vessel in which other claimants are interested, shall be deemed and held to be legally filed the same as if all the parties in interest had joined in the filing of the petition.

SEC. 9. That this act shall not be construed as in any way renewing, extending, or continuing any of the commissions or appointments of judges or officers of the said court of commissioners of Alabama claims issued and made by virtue of said original act.

SEC. 10. That all moneys necessary for the payment of the salaries of the judges and officers authorized by this act, and for the lawful expenses of the said court hereby re-established, are hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; all of which shall be reimbursed out of the said unappropriated moneys before any of the judgments rendered under this act except the first class shall be paid. And after the reimbursement of all the expenses authorized by this act, and the payment of all the judgments rendered thereunder, if there shall remain any part of the said money the same shall be and remain a fund from which Congress may hereafter authorize payment of other claims thereon.

The question being taken the substitute was adopted, there being—ayes 112, noes 73.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as amended by the adoption of the substitute, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. MCMAHON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion of Mr. EDEN was not agreed to, there being—ayes 40, noes not counted.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 93, not voting 82; as follows:

EXPENSES OF PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. SINGLETON. I desire to report from the Committee on Printing a bill to reduce the expense of the public printing and binding and for other purposes. I ask that the bill be printed and made a special order for Monday.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to say just one word. I assure the House that this will save to the Government $175,000 a year.

Mr. CONGER. Does the bill propose a transfer of the public printing?

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir; it does not interfere with that at all.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to the bill being printed, but I object to fixing a day for its consideration.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER, Albany, January 15, 1879.

On motion of Mr. Braman,

Whereas the Army reorganization bill, now before Congress, proposes to prohibit the further manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores at United States arsenals; to sell all the arsenals which thus become unnecessary, and hereafter to purchase ordnance and ammunition from private manufactures only: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress be requested to oppose the passage of said bill, or at least the portions relating to the Ordnance department, New York arsenals, and ordnance stores.

By order of Assembly.

EDW. M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

Mr. PLUMB presented the petition of D. J. Holmes and 2,000 others, citizens of Kansas, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. DORSEY. I present the memorial of C. C. Cox, chairman of the Capitol Hill and East Washington Improvement Association, setting forth the condition of the streets in the eastern portion of the city, the insufficiency of the water supply, and presenting generally the way in which that portion of the city has been treated by the District government. It is a very important document, and I hope there will be no objection to its being printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the memorial of Reed and Dougherty, of San Francisco, citizens of the United States, setting forth that upon the conclusion of the treaty between the United States and Japan, in 1855, they invested large sums in San Francisco and Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, in the purchase of such articles as are needed by whalers fishing in the Kodaic; that the fleets of whalers were to make such Japanese ports as were opened by that treaty their place of rendezvous; that the memorialists loaded the schooner Caroline E. Foote with a valuable cargo, and they with their families sailed for Hakodadi to establish stations for supplying the whaling fleets; that the vessel arrived at Hakodadi, but the memorialists were prevented from landing or trading and were peremptorily ordered away, in violation of the treaty, to their great damage. Admiral John Rodgers, then in command of the United States naval force in those seas, protested, as did the memorialists, without any avail. Another vessel, the Grecian, was also purchased by them in San Francisco and fitted out to take similar supplies, but did not sail, they returning from their trip to Japan before this vessel was quite ready for sailing. They complain of great injury—the figures are somewhat high in the memorial—by the loss of cargoes and by loss in the purchase and charter of these vessels. They think they have a just claim against the Empire of Japan, and they ask Congress to allow this out of the Japanese indemnity fund.

The correspondence with reference to the matter between the Japanese authorities, Admiral Rodgers, and the memorialists, is on file in the State Department. It would appear, as Congress seems to be somewhat in the mood of returning the balance of this fund to Japan on the ground that the legitimate claims of American citizens have been allowed from it, that this claim should be looked at in order that our citizens may be remunerated if it shall be found on examination of the facts that they were thus treated in violation of the treaty by the Japanese authorities.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I also present a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, both men and women, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex. No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States and to make rules for its government and regulation. This is a copy of the same paper that was presented by my colleague and read. SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to receive deposits of gold coin and bullion and silver dollars with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $5, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $5 each, corresponding with the denominations of the Treasury notes of the United States herein authorized, and of the form and similitude of the coin or bullion certificates issued under existing laws.

The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand, and any certificates so paid may be reissued from time to time upon a like deposit of gold coin and bullion and silver dollars, and the fact and date of such reissue shall be stamped or impressed upon the face thereof; and the said certificates shall be received at par in payment for all debts, excises, taxes, customs duties, and demands of every kind due to the United States, and for any of the 3 per cent. bonds of the United States herein authorized, and when so received the said certificates shall be from time to time reissued as herein provided, or the coin in the Treasury representing them may be used as other coin belonging to the United States.

And whenever and as soon as the market value of 412½ grains of silver bullion or foreign silver coins of the standard weight and fineness of the United States shall be at par with the face value of the Treasury notes of the United States herein authorized, then the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to receive deposits of such silver bullion or foreign coins with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $5, estimating 412½ grains of silver of standard weight and fineness to the dollar, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $5—at said estimate—each, corresponding with the denominations of the Treasury notes of the United States herein authorized; and the said certificates shall be of the form and similitude in all respects of the certificates herein authorized to be issued for gold coin and bullion and silver dollars, and shall in like manner, in all respects, be reissued and received. And the gold and silver bullion and foreign silver coins as herein authorized to be deposited and received may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be coined at the mints of the United States into gold and silver coins of the standard value of the United States as authorized by law; and when so coined, such gold and silver coins shall be held and used in the same manner and for the same purposes as the gold coin and silver dollars herein authorized to be deposited and received may be held and used.

SEC. 8. From and after the passage of this act no discrimination in favor of gold coin or against silver dollars, and no discrimination or preference between gold coin and silver dollars shall be made or allowed by any disbursing officer of the United States or his employé. And the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer, all assistant treasurers, and all disbursing officers of the United States shall reserve to the United States and exercise for the benefit of the people thereof their rightful option to redeem or pay in gold and silver coins, or either, all the bonds and all interest, the Treasury notes, and all obligations of the United States redeemable or payable by law in coin; and shall exercise such option in disbursing such standard coins in such manner as to maintain unimpaired their relative value and the double or bimetallic standard.

SEC. 9. In order to provide for the redemption and payment of the obligations or bonds of the United States now redeemable or payable and hereafter becoming redeemable or payable, and to reduce the rate of interest on the public debt, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to cause to be prepared and to issue in a sum or sums not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of said bonds now redeemable or payable and hereafter becoming redeemable or payable, and at such times as to provide for their redemption or payment as they severally become redeemable or payable, coupon and registered bonds of the United States, and each or either of those classes, in such form as he may prescribe, and of the denominations of $50, or some multiple thereof, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States at any time after ten years from their dates respectively, and bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable quarter yearly; and not less than two hundred millions of said bonds shall be of the denomination of $50, and not less than two hundred millions of said bonds shall be of the denomination of $100; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall sell and dispose of said bonds, at not less than their par or face value, for gold coins or silver dollars now authorized by law, or for gold-coin certificates or silver-coin certificates, or gold or silver bullion certificates, authorized by law now existing or herein authorized, and shall apply the proceeds thereof to the redemption or payment of the present outstanding bonds of the United States, at their par or face value, now redeemable or payable and hereafter becoming redeemable or payable, and shall exchange any bonds herein authorized for any present outstanding bonds of the United States, par for par, upon the application of the holder or holders thereof.

SEC. 10. Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury, in calling in, redeeming, and paying the bonds of the United States, shall give public notice, describing by class, dates, and number the particular bonds to be redeemed or paid and stating the day of such intended redemption or payment. And the interest on the particular bonds so described and to be redeemed or paid shall cease at the expiration of twenty days from the date of such notice.

SEC. 11. From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to issue or dispose of any bond or bonds of the United States not authorized by this act or bearing a higher rate of interest than 3 per cent. per annum.

SEC. 12. In order to provide for the business interests of the people and to regulate the proper expansion and contraction of the paper currency of the United States and to give elasticity thereto, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to cause to be prepared and to issue, in addition to the amount of the Treasury notes of the United States hereinbefore authorized, other Treasury notes of the United States of the like form, character, conditions, description, and denominations with those hereinbefore authorized, in such amounts, from time to time, as may be needed, and to cause the same to be delivered, by and through the Treasurer of the United States and each of the assistant treasurers of the United States at their respective offices, to any person or persons applying therefor, upon the deposit with and delivery to said Treasurer or any assistant treasurer by such person or persons of an equal amount of any bonds of the United States bearing interest, estimating principal and interest thereon accrued at such date. And the said bonds so received in exchange for such Treasury notes shall be held or transmitted to and held by the Treasurer of the United States, and all interest accruing thereon during the time such bond or bonds are so held and in transit shall cease and be canceled. And the said bond or bonds shall be returned and delivered to such person or persons upon application and deposit with and delivery to said Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of an equal amount of any Treasury notes of the United States, and thereupon the interest on such bond or bonds shall begin to accrue and run. And such Treasury notes may in like manner be reissued and received from time to time.

SEC. 13. The Secretary of the Treasury shall make to Congress on the first day of each regular session full and detailed reports of his operations and proceedings under this act, in connection with his regular finance report.

SEC. 14. All laws and parts of laws, and all acts and parts of acts, inconsistent or in conflict with any of the provisions or requirements of this act are hereby repealed.

The bill was read the second time by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KERNAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) authorizing the President to appoint Surgeon J. Rufus Tryon a medical inspector in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KERNAN. I introduce the joint resolution by request, and I wish to say that while my impressions are strongly against this kind of legislation, I think this is as meritorious as any of the similar claims presented. I move the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, it was Ordered, That the petition of Henry Mentz be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BEN. HOLLADAY.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of Senate bill No. 1398 and accompanying report No. 513 be printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, the number heretofore printed being exhausted.

THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

Mr. MORGAN. I submit the following resolutions, which I intend to offer as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I ask that they be read, printed, and laid on the table.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

1. Resolved, as the judgment of the Senate, That the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States are as valid and binding as any other part of the Constitution; that the people of the United States have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State and in the Territories of the United States, and that it is alike the right and duty of the United States, so far as the power has been delegated to them, to enforce said amendments and to protect every citizen in the exercise of all the rights thereby secured.

2. Resolved, That the Government of the United States and the governments of the several States are distinct, and each has citizens of its own, who owe it allegiance, and whose rights within its jurisdiction it must protect. That the Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. And that no right can be acquired under the Constitution, or secured through the laws of the United States, except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure.

3. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one and the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States; but the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is, exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. And it is within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, which Congress may exert by appropriate legislation, to prevent the denial or abridgment by a State of the right of a citizen to vote when such denial or abridgment is on account of the race, or color, or previous condition of servitude of the voter.

4. Resolved, That when such right to vote is denied or abridged by the conduct of a person who is not so acting by the authority and in obedience to the laws of a State, the jurisdiction to punish such conduct is in the State government and is not in the Government of the United States.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ROBERT ERWIN.

Mr. GORDON. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 1215) to amend an act entitled "An act for the the relief of Robert Erwin" was indefinitely postponed, and recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be entered.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the sixtieth rule of the Senate be amended by inserting after the words "judges of the Supreme Court" the words "judges of the Court of Claims."

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I almost despair of doing anything for our poor Calendar, which is bending beneath the weight of favorable reports; but I will try once more and in another form. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business each day after this day the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and continue such consideration until half past one o'clock; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 850) for the relief of Daniel W. Perkins, of East Saginaw, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 2160) for the relief of the heirs of Samuel P. Todd, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 5861) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Israel Dodge, deceased; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4553) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico; and

A bill (S. No. 854) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis, in the State of California.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays if it is in order for me to do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment has been voted on, no quorum appearing, and it is not in order to withdraw the call without unanimous consent.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] which will be reported for information.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I trust unanimous consent will be given to withdraw the call.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the amendment first.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 5 the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall not be lawful to grant any reissue of any patent for any invention, except the invention which was embraced in the original patent.

Mr. CONKLING. The withdrawal of the call will leave the amendment adopted?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It was declared adopted, and then a call was made for the yeas and nays, and there were 25 votes for the amendment and 11 against it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum was developed upon that vote.

Mr. CONKLING. So that a withdrawal of the call would leave the amendment, if the Chair will be kind to state, in what condition?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Pending, as the Chair understands. He was not in the chair at the time.

Mr. CONKLING. Then there is no object in withdrawing the call, I suggest to the Senator.

Mr. WADLEIGH. If that is the case, of course I do not ask to withdraw the call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll upon the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 39, nays 0; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move to amend section 7. The changes proposed are merely verbal and to correct a mistake in the bill as reported. After the word "person," in the second line of the seventh section, I move to insert the words "as sole inventor;" to insert after the word "persons," in the third line, the words "as joint inventors;" to insert after the word "invention," in the fourth line, the word "not;" and to strike out after the word "by," in the fourth line, the words "one or more of them" and insert "all of said persons jointly;" so as to read:

Whenever a patent has been issued to one person as sole inventor for an invention actually made by him jointly with another or others, or a patent has been issued to several persons as joint inventors for an invention not made by all of said persons jointly, and such error has arisen through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, the Commissioner, upon the application and oath of the true inventor or inventors, and with the written consent of all the owners of said patent entered of record, may correct the mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move to add at the end of section 15 the following:

The Commissioner of Patents shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, prescribe the qualifications of agents and attorneys practicing before the office, and shall admit to practice only such as possess the qualifications prescribed.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to know what "the qualifications" possessed by attorneys and intended by that amendment are.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The qualifications will be such as are prescribed, and I presume when prescribed they will be reasonable. The evil which this is intended to remove is this: there now being no patent bar admission to which can be obtained on application, any person who can procure a letter of attorney from any inventor has a right to go to the office and handle the papers and look over the files and practice before the Patent Office. This admits of course persons of all characters and persons of no responsibility, and the office incurs the danger of having its files tampered with.

Experience has shown the necessity of some provision of this kind for the purpose of requiring certain qualifications and a certain degree of responsibility on the part of those who have such powers granted to them from the fact that they are able to secure letters of attorney from patentees. I hope there will be no opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it designed if some counselor or attorney of a court comes here from a distance to see about a matter relating to a patent, that before he can approach the Patent Office he must go and be admitted as a practitioner?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Not at all, Mr. President. No counselor in such a case as that would be refused leave to practice. It is only to exclude from entering the Patent Office, examining the files, and tampering with the files, any shyster or any man who may be able to procure from an inventor a letter of attorney. I care nothing about the amendment personally.

Mr. CONKLING. We shall all agree, of course, with the object the Senator has in view; and my purpose in calling attention to this is only to invite scrutiny to see whether it does accomplish that object.

The Commissioner of Patents shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, prescribe the qualifications of agents and attorneys practicing before the office, and shall admit to practice only such as possess the qualifications prescribed.

Of course, on the face of it, if it be applied only to those living in Washington, it is very harmless; but the Commissioner is to find who it is that possesses these qualifications. Of course I assume that every man upon whom this operates must present some proof, must come furnished or must furnish himself with some sort of proof. Here comes a man a considerable distance from home. He has other business in Washington, and some neighbor of his charges him with an errand about his patent. If this means, as I think it does, that before he can do that business he must be admitted regularly to practice in the Patent Office, would have to go through whatever forms are prescribed, having certificates of character or papers, whatever they may be, upon which business is to be done, I should think it might become inconvenient.

I sympathize with the Senator in the object he points out; but why make it a regular matter of admission? If he were to say that the Commissioner of Patents or the Secretary of the Interior or both were in some way to be satisfied of the standing of this man, of the authenticity of the papers that he brings, that he was to be scrutinized in some way, that might be very well; but this seems to require and contemplate a formal admission to practice. That is very easy for those who make it a business, in whose case it is worth while to be admitted, particularly those residing here; but if a man comes casually to Washington to appear before the office, it seems to me this is hedging it about with requirements that might possibly operate as a hardship upon him. I do not mean to oppose the amendment, but simply to call the attention of the chairman to what I have suggested.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It certainly was not the intention of the committee, or the framer of the amendment, I suppose, to require what my friend the Senator from New York seems to fear; but I will admit that in the case of all courts there should be some qualifications for those who are to practice before them; and if there is a necessity for that in the case of any court or any tribunal, there is in the Patent Office. In fact I think there is a greater necessity for a provision of this kind in the Patent Office than there is in any court in this country, because those who are attorneys practicing before the Patent Office have an opportunity to do harm which no attorney would be likely to have practicing before any court of law. I suppose the rules must be so reasonable that in the case to which my friend from New York has referred the fact that a person appeared here who was an attorney in good standing in the courts of any of the States of the United States would be sufficient, and he could prove that at any time in Washington.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This subject of prescribing a kind of arrangement that should make a bar and establish certain securities for the public interests in practicing before the Departments is not a new one. The abuses of existing arrangements have been undoubtedly considerable, not merely in the Patent Office but before other Departments, and for several years past at nearly every Congress there has been presented some bill or proposition to regulate the qualifications and conditions of persons and under which claims, &c., should be prosecuted in the Treasury Department. And yet when we have come to turn our attention to it, as one committee of which I am a member has sometimes been obliged to do, we have found the subject surrounded by so many difficulties, as to where you shall draw the line, as to who may go to the Treasury Department to prosecute a claim or to the War Department or wherever it may be, or who may go to the Patent Office to prosecute a claim, that we have not been able to produce any regulation of law that is satisfactory even to ourselves. There is at this moment pending before the Committee on the Judiciary a bill to regulate the rights of attorneys practicing before the Patent Office, it being asserted to us—I do not say it is true, but that is the allegation—that under a former Commissioner of Patents there was a certain kind of favoritism in the nature of a ring, if one may use such a term as that in the Senate of the United States, that led to very unpleasant results in respect to the rights of persons whose claims and matters were being prosecuted there; and yet there are difficulties in making any provision at all.

Now, the question is whether it is wise in this bill to put the absolute power into the hands of the Commissioner of Patents and the Secretary of the Interior to determine the qualifications of the agents and attorneys in patent matters. That involves the right (because "qualifications" would cover that in my opinion) of declaring that everybody who appears in the Patent Office for any inventor or against any inventor, for any patent or against any patent, should reside in the city of Washington, and to have been previously admitted on the payment of a fee or whatever it may be to carry on affairs in that tribunal.

I am unwilling at this present moment, and without more time to consider it, to repose in the Commissioner of Patents, the Secretary of the Interior approving or disapproving, the power of denying to any citizen of the United States the right to go there with the papers of some poor inventor, or with the papers of some interference claimant or objector and to file those papers and put in his protest. There are evils that exist; but the question is whether in flying from the evils that do exist we do not fly into the possibilities of establishing under some Commissioner of Patents who may come hereafter—I should have entire confidence in the present Secretary of the Interior and the present Commissioner of Patents—but under somebody who may succeed them, of laying down a series of qualifications and rules about this business that would be highly objectionable.

I have no doubt of the power of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Patents now to take any necessary steps to guard against either the tampering with papers which naturally never ought to be out of the sight and possession of the officers of the Patent Office, or tampering with clerks who have charge of papers. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Patents have exercised those powers. Whether they have exercised them wisely in some cases that have been brought to my attention, is another question; but they have exercised them, because it is a mere regulation of "the administration of" their duties to guard the performance of what the law has imposed upon them.

I appeal, therefore, to my honorable friend from New Hampshire to withdraw this amendment and not to press it; let the law stand as it does, and under it I believe that for all the purposes of protection the Secretary has sufficient present power; but to give him the absolute power as the statute now does in respect to the courts to make rules and regulations for the admission of attorneys, I should be a little afraid to do just now.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I desire to say that this amendment was proposed to me by General Paine, the present Commissioner of Patents, in whose integrity and high ability I have all confidence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So have I. I hope the Senator does not misunderstand me about that.

Mr. WADLEIGH. He regards it as being of great importance to prevent the evils which have grown up in the office and which have proved very serious. As for myself I have no particular interest in the amendment and no personal desire about it; but my friend, the Senator from Vermont, if he has had any experience of the business before the Patent Office, must have heard complaints of the character of those to which I have alluded.

I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon the amendment, but I should like to have the question submitted to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINDOM. If the committee have no further amendment I wish to offer an additional section.

Mr. BOOTH. The Senator from New Hampshire gave notice of another amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. There is an amendment which purports to have been offered by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] but which I offered. It has not yet been acted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is in section 19, to strike out from and including the words "but nothing," in line 14, all the remainder of said section, and insert in lieu thereof "but this section shall not apply to any patent which has heretofore expired by operation of existing law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I submitted an amendment some time ago to the eighteenth section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 18, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That in all cases where patents have been passed and allowed since July 8, 1870, but have been and are still withheld under the provisions of section 4885 of the Revised Statutes, because of non-payment of the final fee within the time prescribed, the Commissioner of Patents, upon payment of such final fee within six months after the passage of this act, shall issue the said patents, as if the final fee had been paid within the time heretofore prescribed by law, which patents so issued shall bear date of the time of the actual issue of the same: Provided, That no person shall be held responsible in damages for having, previous to the issuing of such patents, used or manufactured any article or thing for which any patent may issue under this act.

Mr. WITHERS. I offered the amendment by request, but I have seen a communication from the Commissioner stating that very great disturbance would be created by the adoption of such an amendment, from the fact that there were a very large number of patents which would be affected by it, amounting to several thousand in number. In many cases parties have secured patents which have lapsed by failure of the payment of the last fee, and the inventions have gone into the manufacture of articles under other patents, and if this amendment were adopted the Commissioner thinks their business would be ruined. I therefore move this additional amendment, to come in after the word "act," at the end of the last proviso, to protect them against that injury, as follows:

Nor shall any person now engaged in the use and manufacture of any such article or thing be debarred from continuing such use or manufacture by any patents that may be issued as aforesaid.

This will protect them not only against any damages for having previous to the issuing of the patent manufactured any article or thing for which the patent may be issued, but will also not prohibit their continuing the use and manufacture of such article. I think it will meet the objection urged by the Commissioner.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, it would not by any means remove the objection. The parties who applied for patents and to whom they would have been granted upon the payment of the remainder of the fee allowed the two years to elapse before paying the fee, and thereby abandoned their patents. Their inventions have gone into use, perhaps, in other patents; and no proviso like that of my friend from Virginia can, it seems to me, remove the evils that would arise from the revival of so large a number of patents which have expired. I think the Commissioner says the number of patents which have expired and would be revived substantially by this is more than seventeen thousand. In many cases certain parts of the claims in these applications have gone into other patents, and it would occasion an immense amount of confusion and trouble to pass a provision of this kind, which I think is wholly unheard of and unprecedented, and the evils of which would be vastly greater than any benefits that could be derived from it.

Mr. WITHERS. I admit that my understanding of the communication from the Commissioner does not coincide fully with that of my friend from New Hampshire. It does not, as I understand, affect seventeen thousand cases in which patents may be issued; but he simply states that about that number of cases have lapsed under the provisions of the general law by the failure of the payment of the final fee. As to the number which have been subsequently patented the Commissioner is silent, and I assume therefore that his communication on that subject does not materially affect the question, although it is certainly possible and indeed probable that many cases exist in which the patents have subsequently lapsed by failure of the payment of the final fee.

The only object I had in presenting it was to secure some protection, if it were possible to do so, for those cases in which applicants for patents have been deprived of the protection of the law and the benefit of a patent by reason of their inability, their poverty not rendering it practicable for them to pay this final fee; and to give them an opportunity in meritorious cases to procure this benefit I introduced the amendment, and it does seem to me that with the modification I have just offered no persons interested will be prejudiced by the issuance of the patent.

Mr. HOAR. Is there an amendment to this printed amendment?

Mr. WITHERS. The amendment is printed.

Mr. HOAR. Is there an amendment besides what is in print?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir. I offer an additional amendment to come in at the conclusion of the sixteenth line, simply providing that persons now engaged in the use and manufacture of any such article shall not be debarred from continuing such manufacture and use.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, is not confined to the class of cases which he undertakes to provide for. His argument is that he desires to relieve persons who have been unable to pay the fee from poverty. His amendment revives the right of all persons who made a claim since 1870, who did not pay the fee, whether they did not pay it from poverty or because they thought the patent worthless or for any other reason, so that it would enable speculators in patents to find applications which had been abandoned for any good cause by the owner, revive them, pay the fee on them, and bring them forward as an instrument in litigation. It seems to me that the Senator would hardly desire to accomplish that result; but his amendment as he now offers it is liable to that difficulty.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is perfectly right in supposing that such is not my purpose; but I submit that it is not a violent presumption to assume that where applications have failed to be consummated for want of the final fee, where the patents had merit in them, this could only have arisen from inability to meet the payment; that if an invention were meritorious, if there were anything in it likely to make it valuable, nothing but an actual inability to pay the final fee in order to secure to the inventor the right to a patent would have prevented such payment; and in all cases, therefore, in which payment has not been made where the patents are meritorious, I have thought it not illogical to assume that it was for want of means.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator is well aware of the difficulty of securing the passage of an extension bill on this floor. That difficulty arises in every case when an individual has a meritorious claim, and yet almost always those extensions are applied for before the expiration of the patent; and parties have given notice before engaging in any business based on a patent of the hostility they make to extensions. Now, it is proposed by a little amendment to this bill to revive in fact more than seventeen thousand patents.

Mr. WITHERS. No; these are cases where patents have never issued.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Well, to revive them. They have been abandoned. They have been abandoned by the inventors.

Mr. WITHERS. They have lapsed by reason of the provision of the law.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The inventors had two years to pay the final fee, and they have not paid it. They have abandoned their inventions. Now, if there are any individual cases, and possibly there may be some individual cases, in which it is desirable that the patents should be revived, they can secure an act of Congress, upon the examination of the subject-matter, which will authorize such revival; but it seems to me that the passage of this amendment will give the widest and most boundless range to speculators in patents and will involve the public in unbounded litigation and expense. I regard it as being in the highest degree dangerous, and I am surprised that my friend the Senator from Virginia, who can hardly ever vote for the extension of a single patent, is willing to urge here an amendment which may revive several thousand patents, the effect of which he cannot possibly know and we cannot judge.

A measure of this kind is pressed by somebody who is interested. What is that interest? It is for the interest of men who speculate in patents, men who seek to revive old patents, men who obtain reissues fraudulently, that an amendment of this kind should pass. I know my friend, the Senator from Virginia, too well to suppose that he has any such object, and I have no doubt that he presents it as he says by the request of parties in whom he has confidence, but I am satisfied that the result, if the amendment passes, will be in the highest degree disastrous.

Mr. WITHERS. My friend seems to confound the reissue of a patent with the granting of a patent. It is true that I have as a general principle opposed the extension of patents, the reissue of patents, particularly in certain directions in which my constituents have a deep interest. But this is not the case of a reissue of a patent; it is not the case of an extension of a patent; but it is simply a question whether the originator of an invention shall be entitled to secure the issue of a patent for that to which, so far as this amendment is concerned, no patent has ever issued. It is possible that a subsequent patent may have been issued covering part of the same thing, but it does not follow from the amendment I offer that it shall operate as a reissue.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINDOM. I now offer my amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. In any suit brought in any court now having jurisdiction in patent cases for an alleged infringement of any patented article, device, process, invention, or discovery, where it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same from the manufacturer thereof, or from a person or firm engaged in the open sale or practical application thereof, or that he manufactured or applied the same for and to his own use, and not for sale nor for making a product for sale, if the plaintiff shall recover a judgment for merely nominal damages, the court shall adjudge that he pay all the costs of the suit; and if the plaintiff shall not recover the sum of $50 or over, the court shall adjudge him to pay his own costs, unless it shall also appear that the defendant, at the time of such purchase, manufacture, or practical application, had knowledge or actual notice of the existence of such patent, and that such purchase, manufacture, or practical application was an infringement of the rights of the plaintiff.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail; whereupon a division was called for.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, it is evident from the fact that so few Senators vote upon an amendment which affects the integrity and the existence of the patent system that they are giving no attention to this bill.

The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota provides that certain consequences shall follow in all cases where it cannot be shown by the plaintiff that the infringer or the user of a patent who has no right to use it purchases it on actual notice or with knowledge not only of the existence of the patent, but also with the knowledge that his purchase of the same and the sale of the same to him or his manufacture of the same was an infringement of the rights of the plaintiff.

Now, Mr. President, it will be absolutely impossible to show that in any considerable number of cases. It cannot be shown that the party who buys a patented article knew of the existence of the patent, of its validity, and of the fact that the sale to him or the manufacture by him was an infringement of the plaintiff's rights. Consequently that part of the amendment of my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, becomes utterly nugatory. It has no effect at all, because what it requires to be proved can hardly ever, if ever, be proved at all.

Then that would leave the law so that if any person illegally used a patented invention he would be obliged to pay no costs unless the damages recovered against him in the suit were more than $50, or the decree against him was more than $50, and he could recover of the plaintiff costs in his own favor where the plaintiff recovered nominal damages only.

Mr. President, in a great many cases the owner of a patent is obliged to bring a suit not for the purpose of recovering damages, but for the purpose of protecting his rights, for the purpose of settling in some tribunal the validity of his patent, or the question of infringement. In such cases he brings suit for that purpose, whether he is likely to obtain any considerable damages or not; and in many cases where such was his object, he would obtain only nominal damages. Now, this amendment of my friend from Minnesota would absolutely prevent, practically at least, the bringing of any suit simply to settle the question of the validity of a patent, or the infringement, where the damages were not considerable.

Then again, in all cases where no more than $50 is recovered the plaintiff is to be compelled to pay his own costs. What patent-rights would that affect? What would be the effect upon the community? That would affect at least ninety-nine out of every hundred, perhaps nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand patents. In the first place, for instance, here is the telephone; it is an invention extremely useful; it is going generally into use. For the use of one of these machines the inventor charges only $5 a year. Under this bill his recovery of damages is limited to the four years preceding the bringing of the suit. Consequently the damages fixed by himself would be only $20. This amendment of my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, gives anybody in the United States whose knowledge of the validity of that patent (and that involves a good many circumstances) cannot be proved, the right to buy or manufacture those machines and use them. That would undoubtedly destroy the value of that patent; it would be good for nothing. Who would pay anything for a patent-right burdened with such a restriction as that?

Then, too, this amendment would apply to improvements in agricultural implements. It would in fact apply to all patented articles which go into general use. For instance a man has a plow; he has invented an improvement in the plow. He cannot hope to obtain from any user of that implement more than $50 damages for four years' use. It applies to nearly all the improvements that have immensely enhanced the capacity of manufacturing machinery. Those improvements are individually very small. They are almost all of them made by workmen in the mills. No workman for most of those improvements could hope to obtain $50 damages for their use for four years.

What would be the result of this amendment? That all invention would cease from want of encouragement with reference to such improvements the use of which would not be likely in four years to give the inventor $50 damages against the infringer. My friend from Minnesota does not want any such result as that to follow. He does not want the result to follow that improvements in manufactured machinery will cease, that all improvements in articles going into general use will cease; and yet nothing can be clearer than the fact that if all encouragement is withdrawn by such an amendment as this from the invention of such improvements they will cease.

Now, I regard this amendment as being hostile to the bill itself. I regard it as being hostile to the patent system, and if the bill were amended as proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, I should be compelled to oppose, instead of advocating it.

The committee started out with the idea of improving, and not destroying, the patent system. They regard it as being of great value to the country. They regard its destruction as highly injurious to the best interests of this people; and there can be no surer mode of destroying it than by the passage of a law which discourages and makes cease all improvements in machinery, all improvements in articles for general use where the inventor cannot hope to get more than $50 for four years' use of them by an infringer, which covers, in my judgment, ninety-nine out of every one hundred patent rights, if not nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand.

There is another question which I wish Senators to consider. Take, for instance, the telephone itself. This Government has promised the inventor of that wonderful invention that he shall have the exclusive right to it for seventeen years. He has disclosed it to the public; he has paid to the Government all that they had asked for his letters-patent; they have taken his money. It is the duty of the Government to furnish him and every other patentee to whom they have granted letters-patent an adequate remedy against infringement. Now, Mr. President, this gives no adequate remedy; it takes away the remedy which the law gives him; it takes away, in my judgment, his constitutional rights, rights which he is entitled to under the Constitution and laws. It is in effect a violation of the contract which the Government has made with him that upon the disclosure of his invention and the payment of a certain sum of money he shall have the exclusive right to it for seventeen years, and that the Government will furnish to him an adequate remedy for the protection of his right.

I am aware that my friend the Senator from Minnesota has certain local grievances of his constituents to remedy. I think this is not the way to remedy them. Those grievances are temporary, and will soon pass away; but if for the purpose of alleviating the hardships of his constituents, hardships which can exist but for a short time, and hardships which perhaps could not have arisen under this law as we propose to amend it, he shall destroy the patent system or affect its vitality, he will have done to the country vastly more harm than he will have done to his constituents good.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire seems to have had his fears very much increased since the discussion which occurred on this proposition in December. He then thought it would cripple the patent laws, but I think he had not then come to the conclusion to desert his own bill if this little amendment should be adopted. A proposition much more radical than this was then submitted by myself, a vote was taken indicating that a very large majority of the Senate was in favor of it, but subsequently upon a further discussion of the question and the suggestion being made by several Senators which seemed to have a good deal of force in it that possibly that provision might be unconstitutional, I withdrew it and gave notice of the amendment now proposed. The proposition which the Senate then voted for was that in cases of the kind mentioned in this amendment no damages whatever should be recovered. This section only seeks to prevent the little harassing and vexatious suits which are brought by the thousand all over the country under the sanction of existing laws.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that I am moved by a local grievance. It is true that in the State I have the honor in part to represent there is a grievance, and a very great one, growing out of the present patent system; but it is by no means a local one. It extends into many other States beside my own. It is not that case alone that I complain of; nor would that alone move me to urge as strongly as I shall the amendment now proposed. It is not that in a single case the patent laws have been used to vex and harass the people, but it is because the laws themselves as they now stand seem to have been framed for the express purpose of encouraging such proceedings, and to have become the ready instruments of any set of—to use the language of my friend from New Hampshire—shysters who choose to employ them to plunder the public.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think it would cripple the patent system as the Senator from New Hampshire suggests. The patentee has his remedy, if this amendment shall pass, against the maker and the vender of the patented articles, and he has also his remedy against the purchaser and user wherever that purchaser or user has notice that the patent has been infringed. It seems to me that this is a sufficient remedy.

But, Mr. President, even if some little inconvenience may be suffered by the patentee if this amendment becomes a law, it does not weigh in the scale against the great wrongs which are perpetrated under the law and will be hereafter perpetrated if some such an amendment as this be not passed. If you can so change the jurisdiction in patent cases as to give it to the smaller courts of the States, as in other cases for small amounts, I will consent to it. I am entirely willing that the patentee (if a law can be framed to give him that authority) shall go to a justice of the peace and sue for his one, or five or ten dollar infringements, because then the defendant and the patentee have an equal chance. Perhaps that cannot be done. If so, I can see no way to protect the public but by some such provision as that contained in the pending amendment.

The Senator from New Hampshire makes an earnest appeal in behalf of meritorious patentees. I agree with him as to their merit; but I say that it does not follow because the country has received benefits from inventions, therefore laws shall not be changed which are capable of such perversion and which are being made the instruments of such outrageous abuses as exist to-day under our patent system. I agree that the owner of a patent is as much entitled to his property in it as the owner of anything else, but he is entitled to no higher consideration than the owner of any other kind of property. It is not the patentee who will suffer if this amendment shall pass, if anybody suffers. It is not the patentee who brings these suits; but it is usually a combination of agents and lawyers who find slumbering in your Patent Office some forgotten and worthless patent which, under the advantage given them by your present system, they can use as a means of robbing the people—it is they that bring the suit under some arrangements by which the profits are divided.

Now, sir, while I respect the genius and the talent of the inventor and will protect him as far as I can, I submit that it does not require any more talent or genius to buy or steal a patent than it does to buy or steal a horse, and therefore to the purchaser I would accord no more powers than I would to the man who owns any other kind of property by purchase. Possibly there may be some slight inconvenience growing out of this amendment to some of the patentees, but the inconveniences as I stated a moment ago do not weigh at all as against the great benefits that the people would receive by the protection which it would afford.

The Senator from New Hampshire has told us very eloquently that everybody has been represented, that his committee have considered this bill for a year or more—I do not know how long. Mr. President, I have no doubt that that committee have given it that earnest and faithful consideration which they give to all measures; but I want to suggest to my honorable friend from New Hampshire that while the interests of the patentees and the interests of the large users of patents, railroad corporations and others, have been represented before his committee, and have been heard, the people themselves, the great mass of the users of patents, have not been heard before that committee at all. I have read most of the arguments that were made upon this subject, and I have not found that anybody yet has represented the interest of the great mass of the people whom I seek to protect by this amendment. I think that they need protection, and I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire to aid me in protecting them.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, the committee have fully considered the hardships which my friend from Minnesota talks about; and the majority of the committee at least, and I might say the whole of them, were in favor of any practical remedy that could be adopted. The committee think that the bill before the Senate, as amended, in two respects at least, suggests a remedy for the difficulty which the Senator from Minnesota complains of. In the first place, there is a provision limiting patent suits to four years. That will compel the patentee to bring his suit within a time when the evidence can be procured by those who oppose his patent and before the invention has in most cases intertwined itself with large business interests.

In the second place, the bill, as amended, provides that the court may limit the costs of the plaintiff, may give costs even to the defeated party and an allowance by the way of counsel fees.

Now if what my friend the Senator from Minnesota says is true, that the suits of which he complains are the result of a blackmailing conspiracy, then there is no question whatever that the court will apply that remedy; there is no question whatever that the court will decide that the plaintiffs shall not recover any costs. The bill authorizes them to do so, and they will be bound to do so under this bill. It seems to me that that of itself would be a sufficient discouragement to suits of that kind.

Mr. President, I hope that no amendment will be put upon this bill which is hostile to the bill and calculated to destroy it. The bill is intended to remove the evils of the patent system while preserving the system itself. As I said, it seems to me that the inevitable effect of this amendment, if adopted, will be to discourage and prevent invention in all articles in general use, in all cotton and woolen machinery, in all shoe machinery, in all agricultural implements, and that if adopted this nation will remain stationary so far as such machinery is concerned.

I do not think my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, intends to effect any such object; I believe that he would be opposed to any provision that would do it; but yet, when he practically takes away from every owner of a patent right the right of bringing a suit where he cannot recover over $50 for four years' infringement of his patent, he discourages and prevents all improvement in the machinery and implements used in carrying on a large portion of the manufactures and the agricultural business of this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. WINDOM called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) On this amendment I am paired with the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] who was compelled to leave the Senate a few moments ago. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] is unfortunately, I am sorry to say, detained from the Senate by illness. He asked me to pair with him on this bill, I not feeling myself able to vote for it as it stands though there are many good features in it I think. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. He is against this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With that statement from the chairman of the committee I vote "nay."

Mr. WINDOM. He was for it the other day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think under the circumstances I shall have leave to withdraw my vote on the amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I think he was for it when I spoke to him on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote of the Senator from Vermont will be withdrawn.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 27; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the bill be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up the Navy appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the bill be laid aside for the purpose of taking up an appropriation bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I hope that motion will not prevail. It will take but a few moments to pass the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. It will take longer than you think.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not think there will be further amendments.

Mr. WINDOM. I know of one or two others that will be offered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I am aware of none. I trust after the consideration which this bill has had the Senate will not now lay it aside at the very moment when it seems about to pass. If there are amendments, let them be brought forward.

Mr. WINDOM. The naval appropriation bill has been laid aside for the last six weeks waiting for this and other measures. I move that it be taken up, this being laid aside for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair should have stated the question first on concurrence in the Senate in the amendments of the Committee of the Whole. Pending that, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] moves that the bill be laid aside and the naval appropriation bill taken up.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I inquire if that motion of the Senator from Minnesota is in order at the present time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to lay the bill aside temporarily is not in order, but a motion to postpone is.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to postpone this and all prior orders and take up the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from New Hampshire insists on the regular strictness of the motion, the motion now made is the correct one. The Senator from Minnesota moves that this bill be laid aside for the purpose indicated.

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not agreed to. The question is on concurrence in the Senate with the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the first amendment be reported.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask a separate vote on each of the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is entitled to a separate vote on each amendment. The Secretary will report the first amendment.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 13, after the words "before it," to insert the following:

Provided, however, That if in any suit instituted in any one circuit court of the United States, the validity of a patent shall be determined upon final hearing, any other circuit court may recognize said decision, and, in its discretion, grant injunctions based thereon, to continue pending an appeal to the Supreme Court in the first suit. And if the validity of any such patent has been decreed against in a suit instituted in any one circuit court, any other circuit court may, in its discretion, grant a stay of proceedings in any other suit brought under said patent pending an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in said first suit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the chairman of the committee if it is possible that that language on the subject of injunctions in one circuit on the authority of the hearing in another, leaving it to the discretion of the judge in the circuit where the injunction is asked for, is to be understood as allowing it in a case where in the circuit where the first suit was instituted no such injunction or decision has been had? We are now dealing by statute with the usual course of judicial proceedings, and if it is possible that this provision can bear the construction that you are now by this language authorizing a judge to grant an injunction under a particular set of circumstances, then you are doing something that is extremely dangerous. If any such implication as that can be drawn out of that language, I respectfully submit that it ought to be guarded against.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The amendment which has just been read is the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] and I hope he will give to the Senator from Vermont the explanation which he desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment which has been read.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. Section 2, line 4, after the word "pronounced," insert the words "as well as in all such suits hereafter instituted;" so as to read:

In all suits for the infringement of a patent, in which, at the date of the passage of this act, no final verdict has been rendered or no decree for an account or assessment of damages has been pronounced, as well as in all such suits hereafter instituted, the measure of the plaintiff's recovery shall be the same, both in law and in equity.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask for the yeas and nays on that. I want to say in reference to this bill that I do not desire to postpone it for any factious opposition to it. I believe that the bill as it stands is wrong and ought not to pass. Therefore I want the opportunity to prepare an amendment which I think will be agreed to. I cannot do it now. I know that the bill is not in the interest of the great public that ought to be protected, and I want the opportunity to prepare an amendment. It was for that reason, among others, that I moved to lay the bill aside. I shall make no opposition to it if we can have the opportunity to prepare those amendments that are needed, but I am satisfied that the Senate can do something to prevent the grievous wrongs which are now perpetrated under the patent system. I am satisfied the Senate would do it if the opportunity were presented. I am satisfied that on the point I have suggested the committee have made no provision whatever that tends to do that thing, and I hope that the committee may consider it and prepare it. I supposed that the amendment which I offered was agreed to on all sides. In fact, when I offered a more radical amendment in December it was opposed by certain gentlemen, the representatives, I suppose, of the interests that have been consulted in preparing the bill, and it was understood that if that were withdrawn and another proposition made it would not encounter that opposition. But I find that the opposition to this comes from the same interest, the patentee's interest, or the interest of the assignees of patents, the purchasers and speculators in patents; and it seems to be a great deal more intense than was the opposition to a much more radical proposition in December. I want to see if it is not possible to make some amendment that will at the same time that it conserves the interest of the patentees and of the purchaser of patents, conserve the interest of the public also; and I ask that this bill be laid aside in order that I can do that.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota if the purpose is to offer again the amendment which he offered in December?

Mr. WINDOM. I want to suggest another amendment. The Senate is very thin, scarcely a quorum present, and the other amendment, which went to the same ground and was more radical, carried by a very large majority before. I desire to present another amendment, hoping that it may meet the approval of the Senate.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota seems to intimate that this bill is in the interest solely of patentees, and not in the interest of the public. That opinion of his, I think, is not shared by any considerable portion of those who have read the bill and know anything about the present law. It is an attempt, and an honest attempt, on the part of the committee to remove, so far as can practically be done, the evils which press upon the public in connection with the patent system. But, as I said in the first place, they do not propose and have not proposed to abolish the patent system or to destroy it. They regard it as being of too much benefit to the country for that.

Now my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, says that there is nothing in this bill that helps his friends in his own State. He says that there is a blackmailing conspiracy there by which suits are prosecuted. Now, there is in this bill a provision which allows the courts in just such a case as that to impose terms, by way of counsel fees and costs, upon the successful party. It seems to me that that is sufficient for the protection of his constituents.

Mr. President, if this bill is delayed, of course it cannot pass the House at this session. In order to pass the House, it should at once pass the Senate. The delay which my friend the Senator from Minnesota asks will defeat the bill, and defeat the measures which have been taken for the purpose of removing many of the evils which exist in connection with the patent system.

Mr. WINDOM. Allow me to say that I do not desire to delay the bill longer than until to-morrow for the purpose, in good faith, of preparing an amendment and submitting it to see if we cannot accomplish something in the difection I have suggested; I have not prepared any other amendment, for the reason that I had supposed there would be no opposition to the one which has just been voted down; but, if the bill can go over until to-morrow, I will make no further opposition to it if the amendment shall be voted down, or if we cannot agree upon one that will accomplish the object. The Senator says it will defeat the bill. One day more can hardly accomplish that result. It is now nearly half past two o'clock, and it is but a very short postponement that I ask.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It seems that the appropriation bills are already pressing for consideration. Now, let us pass this bill, and I pledge myself if my friend the Senator from Minnesota will draw up any remedy that is practicable to relieve his constituents from the evils under which they are suffering, the committee shall act upon it at once. I am sure they will do so, and it will be returned to the Senate and passed here and go to the other House, because there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that the Senator from Minnesota makes a very reasonable request of the Senator from New Hampshire in charge of this bill. As I understand the Senator from Minnesota, he only asks that the bill be laid aside to-day informally, and in the mean time an appropriation bill can go on, and the bill be taken up to-morrow morning again. If I understand it, that is the proposition the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. The appropriation bill is ready now, and can be proceeded with at any moment.

Mr. ALLISON. You propose to take up this bill to-morrow again?

Mr. WINDOM. I shall not resist taking it up to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I think by unanimous consent we ought to agree to that and go on with the naval appropriation bill now. It is the only appropriation bill ready.

Mr. BECK. I rise to renew the motion made a short time ago by the Senator from Minnesota, to set aside the present and all prior orders and take up the naval appropriation bill, and I desire while I am up to state the reason why I do so. The motion has been voted down once. I have watched this bill as closely as I could. Of course I am not informed accurately about all its provisions; and while I hold that the bill as a whole is an improvement on the present system of patent laws, yet I am equally sure that the only real, substantial benefit that the people of this country will derive from the passage of this bill will come from the insertion of such an amendment as that offered by the Senator from Minnesota. If the Senate is not going to allow him time until to-morrow to prepare an amendment that will give substantial relief to the people against shysters, to use the expression used both by him and by the Senator from New Hampshire, then I will assume, of course, that the great mass of the Senate do not intend even to allow a proposition to be heard whereby relief can be had to the most oppressed class of people. I want to test the sense of the Senate upon it once more by making the motion that I have submitted, so that the Senator from Minnesota can present to the Senate an amendment which will give substantial relief to the people who most need it. I know that the present patent laws are of such a character that the real inventor rarely gets any benefit from them. His patent passes into the hands of great combinations, and they have their agents all over the country, and they are in every form seeking to oppress the people, and the United States courts are open to them for the smallest possible amounts, while they are closed to all others unless they have $500 involved; and unless they can be controlled by some such amendment as that offered by the Senator from Minnesota you may change your patent laws as much as you please and the great combinations that get hold of patents and get them through in every form will have substantially the same power after the bill passes that they have now. It is because I believe that the Senator from Minnesota is in earnest, and so far as I have seen any amendment his is the only real, earnest purpose to get relief against the oppressions of the patent laws, that I do hope the vote will be reconsidered and he will have time at least to prepare a new amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kentucky to submit a motion?

Mr. BECK. I do, to set aside the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the present and all prior orders be laid aside for the purpose he has named.

SOUTHERN MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. MONEY also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 217) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out of the fund appropriated for that purpose certain mail contractors of the Southern States for services in carrying the mails prior to the late war; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MONEY. I move to refer the joint resolution just introduced to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I think that joint resolution should go to the Committee of Claims. A similar bill is now before that committee. In fact I think we have three bills of exactly a similar character before our committee.

Mr. MONEY. I object to that reference. I want it referred to a committee that has jurisdiction of that matter.

Mr. CUMMINGS. We have referred to our committee now by this House three bills on that identical subject. I think all the bills should go together.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move any amendment to the motion to refer?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I move to amend so as to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MONEY. Can I not be heard a moment on that motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear a brief statement from the gentleman.

Mr. MONEY. The sum of $375,000 was appropriated by the last Congress for this purpose, and in a short time it will lapse into the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury, under his ruling, holds that money, and will not pay any claim, whether audited or not. A great many of these claims have been audited by the Sixth Auditor for the Post-Office Department. Now, this resolution simply directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay all claims that are audited and adjusted. There is already a bill before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads having in view the same purpose, but embracing further legislation. This measure simply directs the Secretary of the Treasury to make payment on the claims already audited and adjusted. I know that the Committee of Claims cannot reach this joint resolution for six months, and so does the gentleman who made the motion to refer it to that committee.

Mr. CUMMINGS. This is not a special matter but a general matter. It is a measure which has already been before this Congress, and has been defeated by a vote of the House. After the action of the House three separate bills referring to this identical matter were introduced and by the House referred to the Committee of Claims, before which committee they are pending to-day.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CUMMINGS to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Claims, there were—ayes 72, noes 86.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, and Mr. CUMMINGS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask that Rules 78 and 81 may be read. I think the Speaker will then decide that the rules of the House require the reference of this measure to the Committee of Claims.

The Clerk read as follows:

78. It shall be the duty of the Committee of Claims to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching claims and demands on the United States as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereupon, together with such propositions for relief therein as to them shall seem expedient.

81. It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching the post-office and post-roads as shall be presented, or shall come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the reading of these rules as in the nature of an argument. The practice of the Chair has always been to give the House an opportunity to determine to which committee a bill should be referred.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this the same bill that was under discussion here on a former day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry. It is the duty of the gentleman to know what measures have been under discussion. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. CUMMINGS; and there were—yeas 109, nays 115, not voting 64; as follows:

Mr. REAGAN. Under the rule in relation to the morning hour of Monday I hold that I have the right to introduce a simple House resolution for reference. That rule says "All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions every Monday during each session of Congress," &c.

The SPEAKER. If the full hour is not occupied on Monday for the introduction of bills, then the introduction of resolutions, either House or concurrent, is in order.

Mr. REAGAN. The rule says that the hour shall be for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but if the entire hour is occupied by the introduction of bills there is no time for the introduction of House or concurrent resolutions. The Chair has always been ready on any day to ask leave for gentlemen to offer such resolutions, because, as the Chair thinks, there is really an omission in the rules in that respect.

Mr. REAGAN. The rule says "bills and resolutions;" and I now ask leave to introduce a resolution for reference.

Mr. SAYLER. If the gentleman will read the latter part of the rule he will find that under the regular call it is limited to joint resolutions. As the Chair has stated, there is no provision for the introduction of simple resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair is in exact harmony with all the decisions of prior Speakers upon this subject. The Chair has uniformly sought to secure unanimous consent to any member who has a House resolution to offer.

CIPHER DISPATCHES.

Mr. POTTER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to yield to me to offer a resolution for an investigation into the alleged cipher dispatches.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will it provoke discussion or not?

Mr. POTTER. I did desire myself to say a few words, and some other gentlemen have a like desire. But if the resolution is offered now, I will understand that it must be adopted without discussion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] for the purpose indicated, with the understanding that after his resolution shall have been disposed of I shall again take the floor for the business of the District Committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I must object to the introduction of the resolution now, unless there can be some debate upon it.

Mr. POTTER. I desire myself to say but a few words. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] does not intend to say more than a few words, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has notified me that if there is any discussion upon the subject he would desire to be heard a few minutes. Altogether it will probably take not more than an hour. I therefore would suggest that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, I be allowed to introduce the resolution, and that there be an hour's debate upon it.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Let the resolution be read so that we may know what it is.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will that interfere with the regular morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will come up immediately after the resolution is disposed of.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas certain alleged telegrams in cipher have been published, indicating that attempts were made after the presidential election of 1876 to influence by money or other fraudulent methods the vote of electors or the action of canvassing boards in the States of Florida, South Carolina, and Oregon; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the committee upon the investigation of the electoral frauds, &c., be directed to inquire into the same (and into any other matter connected with the said election which in their judgment may be proper) and that they have power to send for persons and papers and to sit during the sessions of the House, with leave to report at any time. And that there be paid by the Clerk of the House to the Sergeant-at-Arms out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $10,000 for the purposes of the committee, to be expended under the direction of the chairman of the committee or of any subcommittee; and that he make report to the House of the manner in which the same has been expended, which report, when examined and approved by the Committee of Accounts, shall be deemed a satisfactory accountability on his part of the same; and that any unexpended balance remaining in his hands be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] asks unanimous consent that he may have opportunity to report this resolution for consideration to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. BURCHARD. We understand that this resolution refers to the "cipher dispatches," although it does not say so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman had listened carefully to the reading of the resolution he would have observed that the dispatches are so designated.

Mr. CONGER. Can we not pass the resolution now under a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The difficulty is that the Chair could not entertain a motion to suspend the rules while there is already a proposition pending under that order. If the regular order is proceeded with, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] would be entitled to the floor on a motion to suspend the rules. The Chair does not understand that the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia yields the floor except for action by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I dislike to have the delay of a single day in acting on this resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. POTTER. I wish, then, that the gentleman from Michigan would get the objection on the other side of the House withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, to the latter proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] and the request is agreed to. The chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia is now recognized.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEE INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask my colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] to yield to me that I may make a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary, which will not take five minutes. The Committee on the Judiciary was charged to carry on two investigations and to make report at any time. They find, however, that there is no fund set apart to pay their expenses. They ask that by the adoption of the resolution I now desire to submit provision may be made for the payment of these expenses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection to the reporting of this resolution if members of the House have not. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] does not claim the floor, and therefore the Chair recognizes his colleague [Mr. KNOTT] to make this report.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to have it understood that so far as the Committee for the District of Columbia are concerned, I will yield to no further requests for the postponement of their business.

The Clerk read the resolutions reported by Mr. KNOTT from the Judiciary Committee, as follows:

Resolved, That in order to defray the necessary expenses incident to the investigations ordered to be made by the Judiciary Committee under resolutions of the House of December 13, 1878, and of January 7, 1879, the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed, with the approval of the Committee of Accounts, to pay out of the contingent fund to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House such sums as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee or the chairman of a subcommittee thereof shall from time to time, in writing, direct.

Resolved, That any sums which may be received by the Sergeant-at-Arms under the foregoing resolution shall be by him disbursed on vouchers approved by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee or by the chairman of a subcommittee thereof; and any unexpended balance remaining in his hands shall be by him deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the House for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; and the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed to make to this House a report, in writing, accompanied by vouchers in detail, of the manner in which the sums thus received by him have been expended or disposed of, which report, when examined and approved by the Committee of Accounts, shall be deemed a sufficient settlement of his accountability for same.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do we not need to make an appropriation by bill in order to provide a fund for this purpose? It seems to me we can hardly dispose of so large a sum without an appropriation from the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this resolution proposes to take the money from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What are these investigations?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the resolution relates to two investigations already ordered by the House, one in the city of New York and the other in the city of Chicago.

There being no objection, the resolutions were considered and agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1297) for the protection of dairymen and to prevent deception in the sale of butter and cheese in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who shall manufacture for sale or who shall offer or expose for sale any article or substance in semblance of butter or cheese, not the legitimate product of the dairy, and not made exclusively of milk or cream, but into which the oil or fat of animals, not produced from milk, enters as a component part, or into which melted butter or any oil thereof has been introduced to take the place of cream, shall distinctly and durably stamp, brand, or mark upon every tub, firkin, box, or package of such article or substance the word Oleomargarine, in plain Roman letters, not less than half an inch square, placed horizontally in proper order, thus: OLEOMARGARINE. And in case of retail sales of such article or substance in parcels the seller shall in all cases deliver therewith to the purchaser a written or printed label bearing the plainly written or printed word Oleomargarine, in type or letters as aforesaid; and every sale of such article or substance not so stamped, branded, marked, or labeled shall be void, and no action shall be maintained for the price thereof.

SEC. 2. That every person who shall sell, or offer to sell, or have in his or her possession with intent to sell contrary to the provisions of this act any of the said article or substance required by the first section of this act to be stamped, marked, or labeled as therein stated, not so stamped, marked, or labeled, or in case of retail sale without delivery of a label required by section 1 of this act, shall for each such offense forfeit and pay a fine of $100, to be recovered by indictment in any court of the District of Columbia of competent jurisdiction for the trial of misdemeanors, and the one-half of such fine when paid to go to the informer and the residue to be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That every person who shall sell or offer or expose for sale, or who shall cause or procure to be sold or offered or exposed for sale any article or substance required by the first section of this act to be marked, branded, stamped, or labeled, not so marked, branded, stamped, or labeled, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on trial for such misdemeanor proof of the sale or offer or exposal alleged shall be presumptive evidence of knowledge of the character of the article so sold or offered

Mr. HENDEE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of considerable importance, and of course I am in favor of its passage as it is unanimously reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia. Last winter that committee thought the subject of such importance that they requested from the Agricultural Department an analysis of this new kind of butter and also of pure butter. The microscopist and the chemist of the Agricultural Department have both made a report; and for the benefit of the country I ask that these reports which I have in my possession be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The documents are as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, May 29, 1878.

SIR: Your communication of date May 24, referring to me certain samples of butter and asking an analysis of the same, was duly received, and, together with the samples, was referred to the chemist of the Department, Peter Collier, and also to the microscopist, Thomas Taylor, each of whom was instructed to make examination as thoroughly as possible by their respective methods and report as soon as possible. Copies of their reports are herewith submitted, which I hope may afford the information you seek.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. G. LE DUC,
Commissioner.

H. C. TILLMAN,
Clerk Committee for District of Columbia, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., May 28, 1878.

SIR: I have made an examination of the two samples of butter, so called, received from the chemist of this Department on the 25th of present month, and by your order of that date have made a microscopic examination of the same, and I herewith respectfully submit the following report:

The butters have not the appearance of prime butters in either case.

No. 1 is pale and of good color, has a slight odor and taste of butter. I consider it to be a poor butter or a mixed butter. When viewed under the microscope, with polarized light or by plain transmitted light, it appears like pure butter. It is wholly free of animal tissues and solid crystalline fats.

No. 2 is a highly colored yellow butter, melts at a lower temperature than No. 1, has very little odor, if any, of pure butter. When viewed under the microscope by either polarized or plain transmitted light it has an appearance of butter, although other tests satisfy me that it is a very finely made oleomargarine butter.

When oleomargarine is not strained animal tissue and crystalline fats are at once detected by the microscope, the tissue by transmitted light, and the crystalline fats by polarized light. There are two kinds in the market, strained and unstrained oleomargarine. I consider that No. 2 is, therefore, a highly purified and strained example.

Since oelin is the oily portion of solid fats and of pure butter we cannot reasonably expect to detect any difference in the respective oil globules of butter or fat. There are chemical methods by which, I believe, other changes may be effected, and give microscopical points and markings for observation and determination. Therefore the microscope can only be used effectively in the detection of oleomargarine when it contains the fatty acids, such as margarine and stearine, with present known tests.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS TAYLOR, Microscopist.

To the honorable Commissioner of Agriculture,
General WILLIAM G. LE DUC.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 29, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to report the following results of my analysis of the two samples of butter recently submitted for chemical examination by H. C. Tillman, clerk Committee District of Columbia.

The two samples consisted of blocks of about a pound weight each, and upon each was a monogram. * * * The one was of a yellow color, appreciably darker than the other, but in other respects no marked difference was observable to the eye.

In the following analysis that which was darkest yellow will be called No. 1, and the lighter one No. 2.

The composition of the material shows no marked deviation from that of ordinary butter as found in the market, and there is no evidence of the presence of anything injurious or abnormal, since sugar is not unfrequently added to their butter by many of our dairymen.

	No. 1. Per cent.	No. 2. Per cent.
Fat	84.72	86.28
Caseine	.69	.59
Salt	6.21	5.05
Sugar	1.33	1.27
Water	7.19	6.85
	100.14	100.03

As will be observed, there is a very close agreement in the two analyses, quite as close as might be looked for in two commercial samples of a product, varying so much in its composition as does either genuine butter or its imitation.

As to the question whether these samples are really butter or the product known as oleomargarine—an artificial butter prepared from suet chiefly—it is to be determined largely by other evidence than chemical, since there is no reason why the manufacturers may not prepare a compound of exactly the proportions of any given sample of butter.

The character of that constituent given in the analysis as Caseine, and its appearance under the microscope, and the examination of the products under the microscope, will be the chief means by which the real character of these samples may be possibly determined.

During the progress of the analyses it was observed that the color from No. 1 entirely disappeared, while the color of No. 2 remained constant, and so far as this department goes it seems to indicate that No. 1 was the product of a colorless fat, to which some coloring matter as annratto had been added.

Upon agitating the melted samples with hot water, the water became but little turbid compared with the water shaken up with pure butter, and under the microscope the water from 1 and 2 closely resembled each other, while in the water from pure butter innumerable fat globules were seen, but such globules were absent in Nos. 1 and 2. Besides, a sample of pure butter upon melting gave a uniform mass with finely divided caseine separating, while in Nos. 1 and 2 a very considerable coagulum formed, which was estimated and in the analyses marked Caseine.

Under the microscope a sample of pure butter appeared made up of minute globules, while Nos. 1 and 2 presented far from a uniform appearance, not only in the varying size of the globules, but what probably was cellular tissue, at least something not present in the pure butter examined.

I am therefore of the impression that both samples are specimens of the same material, and that this is not a genuine butter made by churning either cream or milk, but is oleomargarine.

Respectfully,

PETER COLLIER, Chemist.

General WM. G. LE DUC, Commissioner.

I give below analyses of butter found upon record, not having had time to complete one myself as yet:

Fats	87.15	86.01	85.00
Caseine	.57	.19	.51
Salt	1.03	1.51	.00
Sugar	.00	.00	.70
Water	11.25	12.29	13.67
Ash	.00	.00	.12
	100.00	100.00	100.00

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAYHAM. I move the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I move all general debate on that bill be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. EDEN. It is not intended to cut off debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MAYHAM. Of course not, but simply to limit the general debate to twenty minutes.

Mr. MAYHAM'S motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which general debate was limited to twenty minutes; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYHAM. I now ask for a vote on the motion to go into committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HARTZELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill pending before the committee is a bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAYHAM. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section of the bill will be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia which have arisen under the late corporations of Washington and Georgetown, the levy court, the late board of public works, the late corporation of the District of Columbia, the board of health, or the commissioners of the District, prior to January 1, 1878; and said court shall have the same power, proceed in the same manner, and be governed by the same rules in respect to the mode of hearing, adjudication, and determination of said claims, as it now has in relation to the adjudication of claims against the United States.

Mr. MAYHAM. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is intended to commit to the Court of Claims for adjudication and determination all claims against the District of Columbia which have arisen under the late corporations of Washington and Georgetown, the levy court, the late board of public works, the late corporation of the District of Columbia, the board of health, or the commissioners of the District prior to the 1st of January, 1878.

The first section of this bill confers jurisdiction upon the court, makes the proceedings in reference to these claims to conform as nearly as may be to that of claims against the United States, and authorizes the court in a proper case to appoint referees to take testimony and engineers to make measurements and report the same to the court for its information.

The second section of the bill provides that all claims against the District of Columbia shall in the first instance be prosecuted before the Court of Claims, in the same manner and with the same rights of appeal as are by law provided for the prosecution of claims against the United States; and also provides that all such claims shall be prosecuted by the filing of the petition within six months after the passage of this act, except in case of claims held and owned by persons under legal disabilities, and all such claims shall be prosecuted in like manner within six months after the expiration of such legal disabilities.

The third section makes it the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to defend the District of Columbia against all such claims prosecuted in said court; and on appeal in the same manner as he is required to defend the United States before said court, and with like powers and privileges.

The fourth section makes all laws in force relating to the prosecution of claims in this court against the United States applicable to proceedings against the District of Columbia and provides that in all cases where said court shall render judgment against the District the court shall with the findings of fact find and determine whether said claim arose under a contract payable in current money or in 3.65 bonds of the District. And the judgment shall direct payment in accordance with the facts so found.

Section 5 provides that if no appeal shall be taken from the judgment of the Court of Claims within the time now limited by law for appealing, and in all cases of final judgment in favor of the claimant the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the amount of the judgment out of any funds not otherwise specially appropriated, and in case the judgment be for the payment in 3.65 bonds the same shall be paid therein, on the certified copy of the judgment, signed by the chief-justice or the presiding judge of said court; and also provides that all moneys paid out of the Treasury on said judgment shall be reimbursed by the Treasurer out of any funds in the United States Treasury belonging to the District of Columbia not otherwise specifically appropriated.

Section 6 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall demand of the sinking-fund commissioners of the District of Columbia and the sinking-fund commissioners shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury so many 3.65 bonds as shall be necessary to pay the judgments required to be paid in such bonds; provided that the total amount of such bonds so issued, including those already issued, shall not exceed $15,000,000. It will be observed that by section 7 of the act to provide a permanent form of government for the District, the sinking-fund commissioners of the District were abolished, but the Secretary of the Treasury is to perform all the duties required by law of the sinking-fund commissioners.

Section 7 of this act provides for diligent prosecution of said claims so filed with the court, and authorizes the court on motion of the Attorney-General and notice to the claimant to dismiss all claims not diligently prosecuted to final judgment; and all claims so dismissed and all claims adjudicated shall be barred from further prosecution before the Court of Claims or any other tribunal.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus given a brief summary of the provisions of this bill. The chief object of the bill and the end which is sought to be obtained is towfold: first, to provide a judicial tribunal for the adjudication of these claims when the same may be tried and determined upon their merits, so that just claims against the District may be ascertained and paid, and thus the faith of the Government as to this class of claims and of the debt of the District may be met and the honest creditor paid—at the same time to have permanently and forever barred all claims which will not stand the test of a calm, deliberate, and judicial investigation before a court of the country well adapted to administer full and complete justice in the premises; and, secondly, to relieve Congress from the labor and responsibility of acting in a judicial capacity upon an infinite variety of claims not properly cognizable before this body.

The theory of our Government, Mr. Chairman, is that Congress shall possess only legislative power. The Constitution provides that—

All legislative power herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

If this provision stood alone, it would plainly enough indicate the extent of the legitimate constitutional power of Congress, and, by fair and just implication, divest it of all judicial functions. And that would be found to be especially true when we come to consider the utter want of adaptability of Congress to the wise and judicious exercise of judicial powers. It needs no argument, I trust, to any gentleman upon this floor to prove that this body is not a safe and satisfactory tribunal to pass judicially, cautiously, and intelligently upon a claim, first involving a patient study of the facts upon which it is founded, and then a careful examination of the contract and the law of the contract under which such claim is made.

Congress as a judicial body cannot, in the nature of things, investigate in detail all the facts and circumstances which go to establish or defeat a claim. The consequence is that the great bulk of this body, if required to pass judicially upon claims, are compelled to vote in the dark, thereby taking the hazard of allowing an unjust claim, to the great detriment of the Government, or of rejecting an honest claim to the utter ruin, perhaps, of an honest creditor of the District. But it may be said that the claims may be satisfactorily investigated before an appropriate committee of Congress, and when so investigated the House may safely follow the determination of the committee, and thus in the main substantial justice may be attained between the individual and the Government. This argument, however plausible in theory, is not sound in practice.

Any gentleman upon this floor familiar with the method of transaction of business before the best regulated committees of this House cannot fail to have discovered the great laxity and want of method, as well as the absence of a strict application of rules of evidence and law so essential to the due administration of justice in the courts. And if by the want of a rigid enforcement of rules of evidence or principles of law governing a case an erroneous result be reached in Congress, there is no appeal from its determination, and the errors committed are irretrievable unless, indeed, some other Congress is asked to review the act or repeal or modify its effect. But I will not further take the time of this House in an attempt to enumerate the numberless reasons why Congress should not assume or attempt to exercise judicial powers. A reason is furnished in the organic law, which to us who are acting or presumed to act under the obligations of an oath to support that instrument, like Aaron's rod, swallows up all other reasons. That reason is found in article 3, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Here, then, we find a reason which overrides all other reasons which we, as members of Congress, can offer for or against the exercise of judicial power by this body. It matters little, so far as we are concerned, whether this provision be wise or unwise; we find it written in the charter under which we hold our trust here; to it we have solemnly subscribed, and its provisions we have sworn to support.

We may create courts if the exigencies of the country require it, but we cannot exercise judicial power, for it is written in the Constitution that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in the courts.

This provision covers the whole ground. It is the argumentum ad hominem, and should be conclusive upon this branch of the subject. But the fear is expressed that if Congress let slip its control upon this subject of claims the Government may be defrauded. To act upon such a fear and to withhold from the courts the jurisdiction vested in them by the Constitution upon any such pretense, is to evince a distrust on the part of Congress of a co-ordinate department which I trust is not entertained by this House toward the judiciary of the country; and if any such sentiment is entertained here it will be regarded by the country as an arrogant assumption on the part of Congress of all the honesty of the Government—an opinion which, I fear, will not be fully acquiesced in, either by the people or the co-ordinate departments of the Government. If there be one department of Government more than another which should merit and possess the entire confidence of the people, that department is the judiciary.

It is a mistake, therefore, to assume that these claims if submitted to the Court of Claims under the restrictions imposed in this bill will not receive careful consideration to the end that full and complete justice may be done both to the District and claimant.

Defended against, as these claims will be, by the Attorney-General, and prosecuted, as they will be, according to the forms of law and well-established judicial rules, the real truth of each case will be ascertained, and just and honest claims will be allowed and paid, as they should be, and dishonest and fraudulent claims will be exposed and rejected. Thus truth and justice will be vindicated, and fraud and corruption condemned.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here as the advocate or champion of any claim. I have no personal knowledge that there is an honest claim against this District, nor have I any knowledge that there is a fraudulent or unjust claim which the District is asked to pay. This it will be the duty of this court to ascertain and determine.

But if there be any honest creditors of this District ought they not to be paid? If any man or corporation has performed labor, furnished material, or incurred expense under contract with the officers in charge of this District, within the scope of their authority, and this District is in the enjoyment of the benefits of that labor, materials, and money, who will say that such creditor should not be speedily paid. If it be true as represented that individuals have invested and expended their private fortunes in work and materials lawfully done and furnished, under contracts made with officers of this District, under the authority of Congress, and such individuals and their families are to-day on the verge of bankruptcy and financial ruin, and some even suffering penury and want, is there a man here who will rise in his place and say such creditor, because he has worked for the District of Columbia, the nation's capital, should not be paid?

Much is said here about preserving the faith of the Government, and just anathemas are pronounced by the defenders of the bondholders against anything that looks like repudiating the bonded debt of the Government. Even those who doubt the propriety of not paying it in fine gold, and dare talk of paying it in silver, the coin in which it was contracted to be paid, are sometimes charged with bad faith and repudiation.

I do not stop now to discuss these questions, except to call the attention of all the defenders of the honor of this Government on this floor to the propriety of doing justice to every creditor of the Government, whether his claims be represented by millions in Government bonds or by tens or hundreds in claims for honest labor.

Mr. Chairman, it is time that this clamor about the claims against this District and the honesty or dishonesty of such claims was finally and forever settled by some definite and decisive action; and this can never be done so long as the doors of Congress are opened to the presentation and settlement of claims before this body. So long as Congress continues to sit in judgment upon these claims, so long will the charge of injustice and oppression be made on the one hand and the counter charge of fraud and speculation on the other; fraudulent and duplicated claims will by inadvertence and ignorance of facts be allowed by which Congress will be subjected to censure and unjust criticism; and honest claims will be ignored or rejected, and injustice done to the bona fide creditors of the District.

I submit, therefore, that every consideration of propriety and good faith concur to demonstrate the necessity of remitting this whole subject of claims to the courts where it appropriately belongs.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that he has consumed half the time allowed for general debate.

Mr. MAYHAM. I would be glad to occupy more time if I had it. I now yield to my friend the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.]

Mr. REAGAN. Before the gentleman from New York sits down I would like to ask if the committee ascertained some probable amount of claims that would be brought against the District under this act?

Mr. MAYHAM. I have not investigated that, and I am not able to answer the gentleman's question. I assume the court will protect the Treasury against everything but honest claims.

Mr. EDEN. I have no doubt there are some claims that are embraced in this bill that ought to be paid; but I think that the first section of the bill is entirely too sweeping and general in its provisions in conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims. It provides:

> That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have exclusive original legal and equitable jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia which have arisen under the late corporations of Washington and Georgetown, the levy court, the late board of public works, the late corporation of the District of Columbia, the board of health, or the commissioners of the District, prior to January 1, 1878.

It will be observed by those who have given attention to this provision that this gives jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear and determine every conceivable kind of claim that ever has existed against the District of Columbia from the foundation of the Government down to the present time. There is no limitation whatever as to the kind of claim, or as to the time within which the claim was to be filed. This levy court and the corporations of Washington and Georgetown were abolished February 21, 1871; so that all the claims that may be brought against the District of Columbia arising against those corporations and against the levy court necessarily must have originated prior to the 21st day of February, 1871. I repeat that there is no limitation whatever. This levy court was the corporation that included all of the District of Columbia, except the corporations of Washington and Georgetown, prior to the act of February 21, 1871. I have not time to state in detail the jurisdiction of the levy court; but it had jurisdiction of pretty much everything in the District outside of these two corporations of Washington and Georgetown. Then these corporations had had an existence from the time the seat of Government was established here until they were superseded by the act of February 21, 1871; and any claim that any person has against these two corporations at any time from the foundation of the Government until some time in 1878 can come into the Court of Claims. And if that court finds that there is anything due to that party, no matter how old it is and no matter what the claim is for, unless there is a successful appeal taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, the chief-justice of the Court of Claims gives a certificate to the claimant and he goes to the Treasury of the United States and gets the money.

Now, the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims has been carefully limited and defined. I believe—I may not be precisely correct, but probably I am right—I believe their jurisdiction is confined to cases of contract. I know it is limited. And then it is limited in point of time I believe to six years. They do not take cognizance of questions of damages at all under the jurisdiction that has been conferred upon them. But this bill, I repeat, gives no limitation either as to the cause of action or the time when it accrued, but it opens the Treasury of the United States to claims from the foundation of the District down to the present time. To those provisions I object.

For instance, any liability that accrued under the board of public works, any liability that accrued while we had the District Legislature here, is a claim under this bill that is to be adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and Congress is to have no further voice in it whatever. That will let in all claims for damages for the tearing up of sidewalks and streets. So far as it may affect the rights of adjacent property-holders it will open the entire question as to damages on account of the establishment of the grade by the board of public works; and how many millions upon millions of dollars of damages may be laying back to come up and be adjudicated by this court for injury done to property in this District by this board of public works no one can tell.

Now, I do not pretend to say that there may not be claims for damages to property that ought to be paid; but I do say that this unlimited jurisdiction ought not to be given to the Court of Claims. I have no objection to that portion of the claims against the District arising out of contracts since the 21st of February, 1871, when the new government was established here. I have no objection to the Court of Claims adjudicating upon them. I objected when this matter was formerly before the House because the tribunal that was to adjudicate these questions had no judicial power. In this bill the tribunal does have judicial power; and I am willing that the Court of Claims may adjudicate in reference to claims against the District of Columbia as far as they are allowed to adjudicate in reference to claims against the United States, and no further.

I am not willing to open the question of damages and allow any man who conceives that he has ever suffered damage from any of the corporations that have existed here to go to the Court of Claims, and, if he succeeds in establishing his claim for damages, to go to the Treasury and get the money on the certificate of the chief-justice of the Court of Claims.

We do not pay any claim in that way. A person who establishes his claim cannot get a certificate from the court to receive the amount found due him. It is not until Congress makes an appropriation for the specific purpose of paying the judgments of the Court of Claims.

If the Committee for the District of Columbia has concluded that the Court of Claims is the best tribunal to determine these questions, why not limit its jurisdiction in reference to these cases as it is limited in other cases against the Government of the United States? We open a wide field, no one can tell how wide—a door which no one can tell when it will be closed.

Unless some important amendments are made to the bill I shall vote against it, and I hope it will not receive the approval of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for closing the general discussion upon this bill has expired. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia which have arisen under the late corporations of Washington and Georgetown, the levy court, the late board of public works, the late corporation of the District of Columbia, the board of health, or the commissioners of the District, prior to January 1, 1878; and said court shall have the same power, proceed in the same manner, and be governed by the same rules in respect to the mode of hearing, adjudication, and determination of said claims, as it now has in relation to the adjudication of claims against the United States.

The first amendment reported by the committee was to insert in line 4, after the word "original," the words "legal and equitable," and in line 15, after the word "United States," to insert:

When the trial of any claim against the District of Columbia, prosecuted under the provisions of this act, involves the taking and stating of a long account, or the making of measurements or computations involving the services of engineers, said court shall have power to award a reference to a competent referee to take and state such account, or to an engineer to make and report such measurements and computations; and said referee or engineer shall report to the court the evidence taken by him and his conclusions on the same, for the information of said court.

Mr. EDEN. Is it in order to offer an amendment, or must the amendment reported by the committee be first acted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the committee will be first acted upon, but it is in order to move to amend this amendment.

Mr. EDEN. It occurs to me that this amendment proposed by the committee makes a provision under which the referee appointed by the court will really decide all the cases. I am not familiar with the practice of the Court of Claims. I suppose they have some mode of taking testimony, and I do not see why the same rules of taking testimony that prevail in other cases should not apply here. The referee reports not only the evidence but his conclusions thereon, and the probability is that the result of this will be that pretty much all of these claims will be substantially decided by the referee or the engineer appointed. I think that whatever rules of evidence the court has adopted in other cases in reference to taking testimony ought to be sufficient in these cases.

Mr. MAYHAM. The object of limiting the taking of testimony to the referee or engineer is to relieve the court from the burden of taking the testimony itself. The referee is not to take the testimony and decide the case, as my friend seems to think, but the object is that he shall report the testimony to the court, and it would be rather a far-fetched idea to say that his conclusions would control the court. He reports the evidence and the facts, and the court then determine for themselves the weight to be given to that evidence, and the mere statement that he reports his conclusions upon it does not in any way bind the court.

There is another provision, however, incorporated in the bill by the amendment, that the district engineer shall be the referee to take the measurements when measurements are required. That amendment was agreed on by the committee, and is one of the amendments reported by them.

Mr. BUCKNER. Would not the facts and findings of the referee be treated by the court the same as would be the findings of a jury?

Mr. MAYHAM. Not necessarily. In very many cases the referee finds the facts and his conclusions. In cases of divorce, for instance, or in equity cases, where a jury is called on to aid the conscience of the court in determining the facts, the court has the power, and frequently exercises it by overriding the verdict of the jury.

Mr. BUCKNER. What is the gentleman's understanding of the words "legal and equitable jurisdiction?" I understand that there are a large number of claims in this District against the District commissioners for damages growing out of the grading of the streets. The Supreme Court have held that that is not a legal claim against the Government of the United States. I desire to know whether, under the view the committee have taken of it, this would include claims for damages growing out of the grading of the streets, and whether that would be included in the jurisdiction conferred by this bill.

Mr. MAYHAM. I can answer the gentleman only by giving my own construction of the language and what I believe was the view of the committee, that that class of claims was not intended to be embraced by the word "equitable."

I think the court will have no difficulty in determining what is the boundary line between legal and equitable jurisdiction, as understood by lawyers and judges. It seems to me that the taking down of a grade opposite a man's house, which the Government has authority to do and which it has done, does not create any equitable claim within any definition of the word "equitable." If it was an equitable claim, then the party might by injunction have restrained the Government from doing the act. That never has been done, and never can be.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman construe the word "claim" as not including a claim for damages, when there is no limitation whatever in the bill itself?

Mr. MAYHAM. Claim for damages for what?

Mr. EDEN. For anything.

Mr. MAYHAM. I construe it as meaning a claim for damages on account of the Government not performing its contract. It does not go into that speculative and imaginative area including anything that a party may conceive is a damage to him; that would not be indemnified under this bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. MAYHAM] a question.

Mr. MAYHAM. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am ignorant whether the Court of Claims, by its general jurisdiction conferred upon it by Congress, has the power to refer questions to referees who shall take testimony and give an opinion. I would inquire if that element is introduced now for the first time?

Mr. MAYHAM. I am not aware that such authority has existed by virtue of any previous law. The supposed necessity for it in this case arises from this fact: there are measurements to be made about which there is a controversy, and it would be absurd to ask the court to go out and make those measurements. There are long accounts to be stated, and it would be a burden upon the court to compel it to take the testimony in regard to those long accounts. This bill authorizes the appointment of referees within the discretion of the court.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I can see no reason for making an exception to the general rule in regard to claims arising in the District of Columbia for which the Government is said to be liable. In all cases coming before the Court of Claims testimony must be taken. I do not know why testimony of measurements should be excluded or made an exception.

And I doubt very much the propriety of allowing referees (the appointment of which will be very much influenced by the parties in interest) to decide questions of fact, because the opinion of the referee will ordinarily be controlling. I doubt very much the propriety of allowing referees to practically decide these questions of fact as affecting the interests of the Government; I think it is unwise. I hope, therefore, that that provision of the bill will be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia has been exhausted.

Mr. EDEN. What is the first amendment to be voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "original," insert the words "legal and equitable;" so that it will read: "shall have exclusive original legal and equitable jurisdiction," &c.

Mr. EDEN. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the words "United States," in line 15, to add the following:

When the trial of any claim against the District of Columbia prosecuted under the provisions of this act involves the taking and stating of a long account, or the making of measurements or computations involving the services of engineers, said court shall have power to award a reference to a competent referee to take and state such an account, or to an engineer to make and report such measurements and computations, and said referee or engineer shall report to the court the evidence taken by him and his conclusions on the same, for the information of said court.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it in order now to move an amendment to the amendment? If in order, I desire to move to strike out the words "and his conclusions thereon."

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment proposed by the committee to their own amendment; the question will first be upon that. The amendment of the committee was to strike out the words "and engineer," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the engineer commissioner of the District."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out of the amendment the words "and his conclusions on the same."

Mr. MAYHAM. I do not object to that amendment.

Mr. POTTER. If that is adopted, then the referee would only report the evidence taken by him.

Mr. KEIFER. He could report the evidence or state the account, but not give his opinion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] should be adopted. This is but a simple reference to a master commissioner as it may be termed. Suppose there are but three items between the corporation and an individual, and there may be a dispute as to one of them. Unless they can be referred to a master commissioner to take testimony and report to the court, the court may be compelled to take time for the purpose of hearing evidence to prove these items, about which there may be no dispute. I think the provision as reported from the committee should be adopted in order to economize time and prevent confusion in the court.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] to say that my amendment would prevent the referee stating an account. A careful attention to the provision of the amendment of the committee will show that that is not the effect of my proposed amendment. The provision of the committee reads:

When the trial of any claim against the District of Columbia prosecuted under the provisions of this act involves the taking and stating of a long account, or the making of measurement or computations involving the services of engineers, said court shall have power to award a reference to a competent referee to take and state such an account—

My amendment does not affect that—or to an engineer to make and report such measurements and computations, and said referee or engineer shall report to the court the evidence taken by him—

Now come the words I propose to strike out—and his conclusions on the same, for the information of said court.

By the language of this provision the engineer becomes a referee who is to give his conclusions. Although merely a civil engineer he would be called upon under this language, if construed broadly, to arrive at a conclusion of law upon the evidence as presented. Now, whatever facts may be proved in the evidence and whatever conclusions the referee may arrive at, I desire the court to examine the whole case in the light of all the testimony. I agree that there should be a referee to take testimony in the manner usual in courts of equity all over this country. I would have the referee report to the court the testimony for its consideration; but I would not have the finding of the referee considered in the light of a verdict. Let the court have the whole record before it as submitted by the referee, and let it examine the question as an original one. I understand that the gentleman in charge of this bill is willing to accept my amendment.

Mr. MAYHAM. I do accept the amendment, although I do not regard it as at all material.

The amendment of Mr. KEIFER was adopted, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "which," in line 6, section 1, to and including the word "health," in line 9, and inserting the following:

Are predicated on certificates of the late board of audit, and including all claims which were allowed by said board, but for which certificates were not issued; and also including all claims for work done since the 21st day of February, A. D. 1871, upon which certified measurements of the engineer of the District of Columbia have been made and filed prior to the 1st day of January, 1878.

The object of this amendment is to define the jurisdiction of the court in reference to these claims and to limit that jurisdiction to cases in the nature of contracts. The claims which have been pressed upon the consideration of Congress arise mainly out of contracts made by the board of public works and the commissioners of the District of Columbia; and the reason this amendment allows the jurisdiction to extend back to February 21, 1871, is because at that time the old District government was abolished and the new District government, under which these claims originated, was established. The claims embraced in the amendment were in process of settlement before the board of audit which was established, I believe, in 1874. In 1876, before the board had finished their work, Congress abolished the board; and consequently they could not conclude their work. This amendment, if adopted, will simply allow the Court of Claims to go on and adjudicate the class of claims which the board of audit had authority to investigate.

The amendment will do away with all questions about old claims which had their origin anterior to the change of government in this District. It will also make it certain that the Court of Claims will not have jurisdiction in reference to questions of damages from cutting down streets, taking up sidewalks, and all that sort of thing. I think that if the Court of Claims is to have jurisdiction at all its jurisdiction ought to be limited in the manner provided in this amendment.

Mr. MAYHAM. It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] if adopted, will cut off or may cut off claims just as meritorious as any that it proposes to include. It is a matter of history that public works which were going on were by operation of a law of Congress summarily suspended. Some of this work had been measured; and for some, certificates had been issued by the District commissioners; some was in process of measurement; and some had not been measured at all. But in many cases where no measurement had been made, the work was just as faithfully performed as in any other cases.

Now, the effect of this amendment is to give a preference to a class of contractors who were so fortunate as to have their work measured or to receive the certificates of the commissioners, which certificates were, however, stopped before payment had been made. The amendment leaves out—or at any rate it may leave out—a class of claimants whose claims are just as meritorious but who have not had the opportunity to get certificates of the commissioners or certificates of the engineer, or anything of that kind. They have only had the opportunity to put in their work, to expend their money, their operations being stopped before the Government through any of its agencies had furnished any evidence of the work that had been done. It seems to me it would be unjust as to these claimants to adopt this amendment.

So far as the amendment fixes a limitation of time, I am not here to antagonize it. Whatever may be the judgment of other gentlemen, I am not here to oppose a proposition to exclude claims arising prior to 1871. That limitation may be right. It may relieve the court from the burden of examining old stale claims, the evidence of which the Government might not have proper opportunity to meet. But I do object to limiting the jurisdiction of the court exclusively to cases where there have been, in the language of the gentleman's amendment, "certified measurements."

Mr. EDEN. I think the amendment covers the case. I do not seek to include any of that class of claims which comes within the intention of the amendment, that is, claims referred to the board of audit. I think my amendment embraces all the claims referred to the board of audit; that is the intention; it includes not only all which receive certificates, but those which the board of audit passed upon. It includes all of those for which measurement was made by the engineer up to February 21, 1871. If that does not include all it should do so. I am not aware of any claim standing upon an equal footing with those which is not embraced.

Mr. HENDEE. I think the gentleman from Illinois is entirely mistaken as to his amendment. It does not, as I read it, cover claims of parties who have performed work where their measurements have not been made, and they are on the same basis precisely as those who have received certificates.

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman will draw up an amendment covering that modification I will accept it. I will accept a modification to meet that case he refers to.

Mr. HENDEE. It would be an unjust discrimination against parties who have honest and bona fide claims against the District of Columbia to draw the distinction where the gentleman from Illinois has drawn it. I would not myself, as a member of the District Committee, object to an amendment limiting the time when they should go back in the examination of claims, that is February 21, 1871, but I would have the power given to examine claims of persons arising out of contracts made since that date, whether measurements have been made or not. If the court found them to be honest claims they certainly should be allowed, whatever may be their nature. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to modify his amendment by confining the investigation to claims which shall have accrued since the date he first named, February 21, 1871, arising out of contracts with the said corporations of the District of Columbia. I think that would be fair.

Mr. EDEN. Not adjudicated by the board of audit.

Mr. HENDEE. I mean that.

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman will prepare an amendment to that effect I will accept it.

Mr. HENDEE. I offer this, then, as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Columbia," in the sixth line of the first section, insert "arising upon contracts, expressed or implied, made since February 1, 1871, and not heretofore passed upon by some competent tribunal."

Mr. EDEN. February 21 is the date the change of government took place.

Mr. HENDEE. Yes, sir; that is the date.

Mr. EDEN. But the Clerk read "February 1."

Mr. HENDEE. It should be "February 21, 1871."

Mr. EDEN. What was stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont; the same I struck out?

Mr. HENDEE. Yes.

Mr. EDEN. Commencing from the word "Columbia" down to the word "eight."

Mr. HENDEE. I am willing to strike out what the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I think there is some mistake about the words to be stricken out. I do not think the gentleman from Vermont strikes out as much as the gentleman from Illinois did.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Vermont was offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUCKNER. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois was to strike out after the word "Columbia" down to the word "health," in the ninth line. Does the gentleman from Vermont mean to strike out the same words and in lieu of what was proposed by the gentleman from Illinois offer what has been read by the Clerk as a substitute?

Mr. HENDEE. That is what I design.

Mr. EDEN. Let it be read as it will be in case the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont is adopted in lieu of mine.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have exclusive, original, legal, and equitable jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia arising upon contracts, expressed or implied, made since February 21, 1871, and not heretofore passed upon by some competent tribunal, which have arisen under the late corporations of Washington and Georgetown.

Mr. EDEN. Oh no, that is stricken out down to and including the word "eight," in the eleventh line. The words stricken out are, "which have arisen under the late corporations of Washington and Georgetown, the levy court, late board of public works, the late corporation of the District of Columbia, the board of health, or the commissioners of the District of Columbia prior to January 1, 1878."

Mr. HENDEE. That is right.

Mr. EDEN. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Vermont, who is familiar with District affairs, being on that committee, whether these contracts we are called upon to provide for were not express contracts?

Mr. HENDEE. They were not.

Mr. EDEN. What is the nature of implied contracts we may be called upon to pay?

Mr. HENDEE. Sometimes work was done without any particular contract, except authorization given to do certain work, and if the result was so and so the payment should be so and so.

Mr. THOMPSON. Was not that an express contract?

Mr. HENDEE. I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania might think it was and the Court of Claims might think differently.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope the expression "implied" will be stricken out. The object of the amendment of the gentleman of Illinois is to define and limit the jurisdiction of this court. When you, in this section, propose the court shall take jurisdiction of contracts both expressed and implied, without limit to the kind of contracts, the subject-matter of contracts, the time when made or how made, I think the purpose of limiting the jurisdiction has been only partially reached. Only claims should be embraced in this section arising upon expressed contracts. There should be no other contracts recognized. The word "implied" should be stricken out. If anything has been done without authority and in violation of law, why should provision be made for recognizing it and making it valid? This section as it now stands does that. Any man who has done work or done anything which can be tortured into assumption on the part of the corporation as an implied contract is embraced in this. One of the great troubles of the court will be in such cases to determine its own jurisdiction and decide the character of cases in reference to which it shall give its decision.

Mr. HENDEE. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to enter into a discussion on this floor as to the distinction between expressed and implied contracts. Every good lawyer ought to know something about it. I suppose it is a good rule of law that a man may recover under an implied contract. It is a simple question for the Court of Claims to say whether a claim arises under an expressed or implied contract, and if they decide that it is an implied contract, that the party had authority to do the work and had done it and is entitled to his pay, he should have it allowed the same as if under a contract in writing. The object is to protect the Treasury against any invasion of the kind the gentleman speaks of, and I think the amendment is in good form and should pass as it reads.

Mr. EDEN. I think I prefer my own amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Vermont. I do not know where the words "implied contract" would lead to. It certainly would open up a wide field.

Mr. HENDEE. I will strike out the word "implied." The gentleman shall have it as he wants it, and then the gentleman will be hounded if he is here next Congress.

Mr. EDEN. Fortunately I will not be here in the next Congress.

Mr. HENDEE. I shall not be here either, but if we were by striking out the word "implied" we would be hounded by these parties who have these valid claims under implied contracts.

Mr. HUNTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that if he strikes out the word "implied" he should strike out also the word "express" and simply leave the word "contract."

Mr. HENDEE. I will made that modification.

Mr. THOMPSON. That will mean the same thing.

Mr. HENDEE. Well, it is common sense.

Mr. THOMPSON. That leaves it about where it started.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the section be read as it will be amended if the substitute be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims is hereby extended to, and it shall have exclusive original legal and equitable jurisdiction of, all claims now existing against the District of Columbia arising upon contracts made since February 21, 1871, and not heretofore passed upon by some competent tribunal, and said court shall have the same power, &c.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Have the amendments proposed by the committee to this section been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. They have been.

Mr. HENDEE. They were amended before they were adopted.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand they were amended, but I did not understand that they had been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. They have been adopted, and this is an independent amendment.

The substitute offered by Mr. HENDEE for Mr. EDEN'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I offer the following amendment:

In line 4 strike out the words "legal and equitable."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order. Those words have been inserted by an amendment, and it is not in order to strike them out.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will modify my motion so as to strike out merely the words "and equitable," in line 4.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order. Those words have been inserted by an amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word on the point of order. A motion to strike out the same thing that has been inserted would not be in order; but under the rules a motion to insert additional matter or to strike out a portion of that which has been inserted is proper.

Mr. MAYHAM. The effect of that would be, if the statement of the rule by the gentleman from Texas is correct, to neutralize or destroy an amendment entirely, and yet to keep within the rule which says that words which have been inserted shall not be stricken out.

Mr. REAGAN. Rule 46 provides:

46. Any member may call for the division of a question, before or after the main question is ordered, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that, one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment nor a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. HUNTON. That does not touch this question.

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot turn to it at this moment, but there is a distinct rule that a motion to strike out a part of that which has been inserted or to make additions to what has been inserted is allowed.

Mr. HUNTON. I think my friend from Texas must be mistaken, because when the motion to insert is made that motion is subject to amendment, and the failure to amend the motion to insert puts it as the judgment of the committee that the words the committee puts in contain the sense of the committee, and it is not in the power of the committee afterward to change that.

Mr. REAGAN. I concede that; but this is to strike out a part, not the whole.

Mr. HUNTON. The time to strike out any portion of the amendment was when the motion to insert was pending.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules to turn to them as I know them to be; but I know the rule to be that after a motion to insert has been voted on the motion may be entertained to strike out any part of it or to add to it, or to strike out the whole if connected with another part of the bill so that it is a different proposition. What we cannot do is to strike out what has been inserted in toto, because that would be voting a second time on the same proposition; but anything which enlarges or diminishes what has been inserted may be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule which authorizes striking out except the rule the gentleman from Texas has referred to; and the Chair holds it is not admissible at this time to entertain the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, and therefore rules it out of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I move to strike out, in line 4, the words "original legal and equitable."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain that motion.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I make this motion for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman who reports this bill to these words, so that he may make the committee understand, or at least one member of it, what they mean. I for the life of me cannot tell. I cannot conceive, in thinking about it for a little while, of any possible equitable claim that can exist against a municipal corporation where the end of the judgment is a payment of the sum out of the Treasury of the United States. If that be true, then the words mean nothing; and if they mean nothing there is no use in having them there; they are surplusage. On the contrary, if it is intended by these words "legal and equitable" to enable parties to enforce a class of claims that might be conceived of against the District that are not legal claims, then certainly the words do not belong there and should be stricken out.

Mr. MAYHAM. If there are no equitable claims that the court can take cognizance of; if it be true, as the gentleman says, there can be no equitable claims against a municipality, then the words can do no harm because ingenuity will be inadequate to find a case that will come under the word "equitable." However, if there be claims in which a court of equity may be invoked against a municipality, then there is no reason why they should not respond in equity as well as an individual; so that in any aspect of the case the words, if there be such cases, should be incorporated and remain in the bill. If there be none they can do no harm.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes; but, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is reporting a bill here from his committee and asking this committee to recommend its passage to the House. At least, it is reported from that committee.

Now, then, I offer this amendment for the purpose of having the gentleman or some one else from the Committee for the District of Columbia tell me what class of claims is proposed to be covered by the words "legal and equitable claims." I am not informed upon that point. I get no information by the use of those words; and, as I said before, I cannot conceive what equitable claims they could cover. I think the words ought to be stricken out unless the committee can tell us what class of claims we are giving a status to in the court by the use of those words.

Mr. MAYHAM. There may be equities between the owner of a claim and the man who holds the claim as a trustee for another, and who might be in a position only to enforce his claim as the claim of an agent or trustee. If my friend wants to know what class of equities could arise, there is none, and I do not propose to hunt for any.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman is not ingenious or happy in that illustration. If there be equities between the parties, there is no necessity for now conferring jurisdiction. They can go into a court of chancery and fight out their rights in equity without this bill or independent of it.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I would suggest one fact in connection with this bill which occurs to me, and that is that the Court of Claims has no equitable jurisdiction. The Court of Claims as at present constituted, as I understand the law, and it was so decided in a case reported, I think, in 7 Wallace, has no equitable jurisdiction.

I presume that the object of this amendment is to give the court jurisdiction and equity in cases relating to the District of Columbia as well as in law. If that is the intention, this bill does have that effect and the words are not surplusage.

If the court ought not to have the jurisdiction, then the words should be stricken out. As to the facts involved I have not examined them, but I do know that the Supreme Court has decided that the Court of Claims has no equitable jurisdiction.

Mr. HENDEE. Has the gentleman any objection to giving jurisdiction in equity to the court?

Mr. BURCHARD. I have none.

The question was taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and it was not agreed to; there being on a division ayes 14, noes not counted.

The Clerk read the second section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. All claims against the District of Columbia shall, in the first instance, be prosecuted before the Court of Claims in the same manner, and subject to the same rules, and with the same right of appeal, either by the District of Columbia or by the claimant, and subject to the same rules and regulations as are prescribed by law for appeals on behalf of the United States or claimants against the United States from the judgments of the Court of Claims: Provided, That the prosecution of all claims shall be commenced in the Court of Claims by the filing of the petition of the claimant, as required by the rules and practice of said court, within six months from the passage of this act; and all claims against the District of Columbia now existing, and not so filed within said time, shall be forever barred, except in cases of claims owned and held by persons under legal disabilities, in which case such claims shall be in like manner barred unless commenced as aforesaid within six months after the expiration of such disability.

Mr. HENDEE. I move to amend that section by adding the word "such" after the word "all," in the first line; also, after the word "all," in the ninth line; and also after the word "all," in the twelfth line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the third section, as follows:

SEC. 3. The Attorney-General of the United States shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to defend the District of Columbia against all claims against said District of Columbia, prosecuted in said Court of Claims, and on appeal, in like manner as he is now by law required to defend the United States in said court, with the same power to interpose counter claims and offsets against claims, and with like power of appeal as in cases against the United States tried in said court: Provided, That all claims predicated on certificates of the board of audit, or claims allowed by the late board of audit, but for which certificates were not issued, or certified measurements of the engineer of the District of Columbia, which certificates have been made and filed prior to the 1st day of January, 1878, shall have preference over other cases against the District of Columbia prosecuted under this act before said court.

The committee reported an amendment to strike out the proviso.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the fourth section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. All laws now in force relating to prosecutions of claims against the United States in the Court of Claims shall apply as far as applicable to the prosecution, practice, hearing, and determination of claims against the District of Columbia, authorized to be prosecuted under the provisions of this act: Provided, That in all cases when such Court of Claims shall give judgment in favor of any claimant, said court shall, with their finding of facts, find and determine whether the terms of the contract under which such claim shall have originated required the payment therefor in lawful money or in 3.65 bonds, and the judgment shall direct the payment in accordance with the facts so found.

The committee reported an amendment to insert after the words "this act," in line 6, the following:

Provided, That motions for a new trial shall be made by either party within twenty days after the rendition of the judgment: And provided further, That in the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness in the same because he or she is a party to or interested in the issue tried.

Mr. KEIFER. Is that intended to take the place of the remainder of the section? I would inquire whether it is necessary to make provision in this bill for parties testifying? I understand there is a general law of Congress that would cover that point.

Mr. MAYHAM. I will answer the gentleman. I, too, had understood that there was a general law authorizing parties to be sworn in all cases tried in this District, but I am informed that that law is not applicable to the Court of Claims. In civil or criminal cases before the supreme court of the District or the District court, the parties are by law privileged to be witnesses, but I am told that the construction of the Court of Claims is that that law does not extend to that court.

Mr. KEIFER. The law applies to all the courts of the United States.

Mr. MAYHAM. I suppose so, but I am told that an adverse construction has been put upon it.

Mr. KEIFER. I see no reason why it should not apply to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MAYHAM. Nor do I, but I am told that that is the construction which has been put upon the law.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. I move now to strike out in lines 11 and 12 the words "and the judgment shall direct the payment in accordance with the facts so found."

I offer this amendment because it is unnecessary to say it here. It is not necessary to direct how the judgment shall be paid in 3.65 bonds because if section 5 remains unaltered the effect of the judgment will be just the same, whether these words are in the bill or not; but further I desire to have these words stricken out because I expect to offer an amendment to section 5, and with these words stricken out and my amendment adopted the whole bill will be consistent in all respects.

I do not believe that the judgments in this class of claims against the District of Columbia should stand upon any higher or better ground for payment than the other judgments to be rendered by that court in the cases of claims against the United States. Let them take the same course. Let the condition of the Treasury be looked to. If judgments shall be rendered in favor of claimants under this bill, should it become a law, let them be certified to Congress as in other classes of claims that are now being considered by that court. The condition of the Treasury may be such that Congress should have something to do with directing the payment of these judgments. We will be entering on an entirely new policy if we adopt that proposed to be established by this bill.

Mr. MAYHAM. In reference to the first objection, and to the proposition to modify this section, it seems to me that the proposed modification would work irreparable injury. In the first place, certain contracts were made which were required to be paid in 3.65 bonds. Sometimes those bonds are not at par with the currency of the United States. Now, it is due to the Government of the United States and to the District that such contracts shall be paid in the bonds contemplated by the contracts. Now, if these judgments are to be made as money judgments, they would be a direct bill upon the Treasury either of the District or of the Government of the United States. It is to guard against that contingency and to give contractors what they contracted for that it was deemed necessary and proper to put this provision into the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to make one further suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word, and will yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. I do not want to be understood as opposing the policy of paying these contractors in the bonds which they agreed to take; that is not the question. What I desire is that Congress shall have the power after the judgments are rendered of regulating the issuing of the bonds or the payment of the money. My proposition is not to require these judgments to be paid in currency; I have no such object in view. But I want Congress to have the control of the issuing of these bonds after the judgments have been rendered. I therefore have moved to strike out the words in this section which I have indicated, in order that it may be in harmony with what I hope will be done in reference to section 5.

Mr. MAYHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. MAYHAM. How will Congress know, or how can the Treasury know that these judgments are payable in bonds, unless the decree so determines?

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman who had charge of the bill had remembered the language of the bill he would not have asked me that question. The bill itself provides that the judgments in favor of the claimants shall "find and determine whether the contract under which such claim shall have originated required the payment thereof in lawful money or in 3.65 bonds."

Mr. MAYHAM. Exactly.

Mr. KEIFER. And I do not propose to strike out any portion of that language.

Mr. MAYHAM. That is, the "court shall with their finding of facts" so determine. Now, I insist that that finding shall also be incorporated in the decree as well.

Mr. KEIFER. It is incorporated in the finding, but I do not want the court to state and direct what I desire to have reserved to Congress, that is, that the judgments shall be paid in bonds or in currency. My object is to put this class of claims in the court upon the same footing that all the other claims against the United States occupy. There may be such a condition of things when these judgments are rendered that the treasury of the District of Columbia can pay them, and thereby will be avoided the necessity of our putting our hands into the Treasury of the United States and paying these claims. I desire simply and solely to put these claims upon a par and only upon a par with all other claims against the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to give notice now that from this time on I shall insist upon the enforcement of the rules. We are now considering this bill under the five-minute rule. Any gentleman has a right to offer any amendment, even though it be pro forma; but he has no right to withdraw such amendment except by unanimous consent. I shall insist upon a vote being taken upon every amendment offered to this bill from this time forward.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw that amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I object. Let it be voted upon.

The amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. KEIFER; and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 12, noes 70; no further count being called for.

Section 5 of the bill was then read, as follows:

SEC. 5. If no appeal be taken from the judgment and determination of the Court of Claims in cases provided for in this act, within the term limited by law for appealing from the judgments of said court, and in all cases of final judgments by the Court of Claims, or on appeal by the Supreme Court, where the same are affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid, as hereinafter provided, by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if the same be payable in money, and if payable in 3.65 bonds, the same shall be issued: Provided, That no payments shall be made, either in money or bonds, except upon the presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of said judgment, certified by the clerk of the Court of Claims and signed by the chief justice, or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court.

The Committee for the District of Columbia reported the following as an addition to section 5:

And provided further, That all moneys paid by the Treasurer of the United States on any judgment or judgments rendered by the Court of Claims under the provisions of this act shall be charged by the Treasurer of the United States against the District of Columbia, and said Treasurer shall reimburse the United States Treasury for such payments out of any money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the District of Columbia not otherwise specifically appropriated.

Mr. EDEN. As a substitute for the amendment of the committee, I move to amend by striking out all after the word "claimants," in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

The clerk of the Court of Claims shall transmit to the House of Representatives a list of the judgments of the court, together with all the evidence taken in all the cases, for the further consideration of Congress: Provided, That no judgments shall be paid under this act until such judgments shall be authorized by Congress.

The object of this amendment is to bring before Congress the judgments which may be rendered by the Court of Claims under this bill, together with all the evidence taken, so that Congress may determine for itself the merits of the claims. This is the course we pursue in reference to claims examined by the commissioners of claims. All the awards made by those commissioners are certified to Congress, together with all the evidence. These awards, with the evidence, go before the proper committee of the House, who, after examination, make report; and the House then determines whether or not the judgments of the commissioners shall be paid. I think the same rule should be adopted in reference to these District claims which will be passed upon by the Court of Claims.

This is the course pursued also in reference to claims passed upon by the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General. The Secretary of the Treasury reports all these cases to Congress, together with the evidence; and as to claims thus reported, as well as to those submitted by the commissioners of claims, it is often found necessary to refuse payment of some of the claims.

No harm can be done by keeping this power in our own hands. If any question of fraud or anything of that sort should arise after the adjudication of the court, it will be within the power of Congress to determine whether these judgments should be paid. As a matter of course, if upon proper consideration payment appears to Congress to be proper, the necessary appropriation will be made.

Unless an amendment of this kind be adopted, just so soon as the Court of Claims has rendered judgment and the chief-justice of the court has certified that judgment to the Secretary of the Treasury, the money will be taken out of the Treasury and the claim paid. I think there is no necessity for such extreme haste in the payment of these claims. It seems to me much safer to allow the claims to be reported to Congress so that, should any question arise as to whether fraud has been perpetrated upon the court, Congress may take suitable action.

Mr. HENDEE. The argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] is very peculiar. He likens this proceeding before the Court of Claims to the examination of cases by the southern claims commissioners. But in the latter case the trials are almost entirely ex parte. The commissioners send their agents through the country to gather testimony, and then pass upon the claims without any notice of the hearing or anything of that kind. Hence, perhaps it becomes judicious that Congress should exercise a controlling power over the findings of those commissioners.

But the present bill recognizes an existing court and provides for full trials in which both parties will submit their evidence and be heard by counsel; and then this court, a court of competent jurisdiction, is to render judgment. What a curious idea, that Congress should constitute itself a court of appeal from a judicial body which has fully tried a case coming regularly before it.

The gentleman says that he does not see the necessity of haste in this matter. Why, sir, we have kept these parties out of their money for the last seven or eight years; and now what does the gentleman propose? That when the parties have had a full and free trial before a court which is recognized as one of the leading courts of the United States—a court established for the examination of questions of this kind—the findings of the court shall be submitted to Congress, and these men be kept out of their money for two or three years more at the caprice of this body. This appears to me entirely unjust. When a judgment has been rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction and the law provides means by which that judgment shall be paid, Congress should have nothing further to do with the matter.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that up to 1860—I believe that was the year—all the judgments of the Court of Claims were reported to Congress together with the evidence; and it depended entirely upon the will of Congress whether those judgments were paid or not.

Mr. HENDEE. And at the time mentioned by the gentleman Congress saw the foolishness of such a proceeding and repealed the law which provided for it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. EDEN to the amendment reported by the committee, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 30, noes not counted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to demand of the sinking-fund commissioners of the District of Columbia so many of the 3.65 bonds as may be necessary for the payment of the judgments adjudged to be payable in said bonds; and said sinking-fund commissioners are hereby directed to issue and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of 3.65 bonds required to satisfy the awards payable in such bonds and no more, which bonds shall be received by said claimants at par in payment of such claims: Provided, That the gross amount of such bonds heretofore and hereafter issued shall not exceed in the aggregate $15,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia to this section will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "commissioners" and insert the word "commissioner," in line 2, page 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the close of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no money shall be paid out of the Treasury under this act where under the law the claimants would be entitled to 3.65 bonds.

Mr. MAYHAM. I have no objection to accept that amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. While the Clerk is writing down the amendment, I merely wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee for the District of Columbia regard that amendment as surplusage. The bill provides for the payment in 3.65 bonds. But the committee offer no objection to it. If it be the pleasure of the committee to adopt it, we are willing to let it go.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 7, as follows:

SEC. 7. In all cases prosecuted under the provisions of this act it shall be the duty of the claimant, after the commencement of said actions, to prosecute them in said court diligently; and in all cases when any case has been reached in its order on the calendar, and the trial thereof has been unreasonably delayed by the claimant, the said court may, on motion of the Attorney-General, on notice to the claimant, or his counsel, attorney, or solicitor, dismiss said claim; and such dismissal or final judgment on any claim shall be a conclusive bar against any further prosecution of such claim before any court or tribunal whatsoever.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "diligently," in line 4, insert the following: "And after any issue of law or of fact shall be joined in any case, the Attorney-General shall have power to place the same on the trial calendar of said court for trial."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYHAM. I move now that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARTZELL reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendments will be read, and members will designate the ones on which they desire a separate vote. Is there objection to that suggestion?

Mr. BLACKBURN. We accept the suggestion of the Chair most willingly.

The amendments were read, and agreed to in gross.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 20.

Mr. COBB demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are not ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. No quorum has voted, and I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I sincerely hope that point will not be insisted on.

Mr. REAGAN. A quorum has not voted, and it is necessary to have the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. REAGAN and Mr. MAYHAM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 16, noes 131.

So (one-fifth not having voted in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. DURHAM. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask my colleague to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. DURHAM. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not intend to trespass further on the patience of the House, but in view of the fact there is but one day more left to the District of Columbia, and not intending to move a recess in order that we may go on with the consideration of that business to-night, which I know gentlemen here do not desire, I wish to ask unanimous consent that Thursday, January 30, be set apart for the consideration of the business for the District of Columbia, after the hour of two o'clock, under the provisions of the rule setting apart to-day after two o'clock for that business.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

FORESTRY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following:

To the House of Representatives:

R. B. HAYES.

The message was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPRENTICES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the bill has been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Let it be read.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It simply refers to the enlistment of apprentices on training-ships of the United States Navy. That is all there is of it.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. If there be no objection the bill might be passed now under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not in order, as there is one already pending.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Let it be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let it go over, and let the special order, as suggested by the gentleman from Maryland, be agreed to.

Mr. KIMMEL. I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. KIMMEL's motion, by unanimous consent, was agreed to.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 850) for the relief of Daniel W. Perkins, of East Saginaw, Michigan; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4553) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award.

The bill (H. R. No. 2160) for the relief of the heirs of Samuel P. Todd, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 5861) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Israel Dodge, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, covering a copy of a preliminary report from Captain A. N. Damrell, Corps of Engineers, on the survey being made in accordance with an item in the river and harbor act of June 18, 1878, providing for the improvement of the Mobile Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers and a copy of a report of Major C. R. Suter, Corps of Engineers, on the result of an examination, made in compliance with the requirements of section 2 of the river and harbor act of June 18, 1878, of the Missouri River at and near its junction with the Kansas River, and the estimated cost of its improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COURTS IN COLORADO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and laid on the table some time ago, on which he wished to make some motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I moved at that time that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask a conference, and I think that was ordered. The message should have been sent. I said that owing to the absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] I would move a conference, which would bring the matter to a point where it could be disposed of one way or the other without delay. I had the impression that that order was made, and in that case the bill should go back to the House with that action of the Senate in regard to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT was, by unanimous consent, authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CONKLING, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. DAVIS of Illinois were appointed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of Dr. H. A. Hagen, professor of natural history at Harvard University; Professor Smith, of Yale College; P. R. Uhler, the president of the Maryland Academy of Science, and several other distinguished entomologists of the United States connected with various universities and the Government, praying that the work of Professor Townsend Glover, illustrating the insects of the North American Continent, may be purchased. This work is offered to the Government by Professor Glover at the price of the engravings which accompany it, without imposing as a condition any compensation to him for his large labor. I can say, from a personal examination of Professor Townsend Glover's work, that it is of the very greatest importance in disclosing the habits and the means of extermination of the insects injurious to vegetation.

I also present Professor Glover's own memorial proposing to transfer the entomological works to the Government at the cost of the engraved plates; and I call the special attention of my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, to this matter.

I move that the petition and the memorial which I have presented be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McPHERSON presented a memorial of the religious Society of Friends of the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, remonstrating against the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Department of the Interior to the War Department; which was referred to the select committee to consider the subject of the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of R. H. Flower and others, citizens of Howard County, Maryland, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pension; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON. I present a petition of citizens of the Territory of Dakota, praying the passage of the bill providing for an additional associate justice for the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota. I will state that the bill providing for such an additional judge has been reported by the committee favorably, and this petition sets out in full the reasons why the bill should pass. I move that it be printed for the information of the Senate, and lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I have just received a petition from numerous citizens in New York, merchants and ship-owners, praying relief in a respect which they state in the legislation to be had touching the so-called Geneva award. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented additional papers in support of the bill (S. No. 1555) granting a pension to Fannie Lull; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Dr. Asa Wall, of Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No. 1662) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and for the erection thereon of a military post at El Paso, Texas.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Moore, late private Company H, Twenty-fourth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, praying indemnity for a horse lost in the military service of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of Thomas B. Hunt, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 541) for the relief of William H. Carmen, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1271) for the relief of Jenkins A. Fitzgerald, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1304) granting a pension to Anna M. Clippinger, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PLUMB. Yesterday the bill (S. No. 1650) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and report to Congress the amount of money expended and indebtedness assumed by the State of Kansas in repressing invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities, was introduced by me and by mistake referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That change of reference will be made.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up House bill No. 4200, reported by the Judiciary Committee, which gives the consent of the United States to the transfer of a portion of the National Road to one of the counties of the State of Maryland.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4200) relating to the National Road in the State of Maryland, and to give consent of the United States to a certain act of the General Assembly of Maryland in relation to said road. It gives the consent of the United States to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, passed at the January session, 1878, chapter 158, entitled "An act to transfer to the counties of Allegany and Garrett the control of the National Turnpike or United States Road through said counties, and to provide for the maintenance thereof."

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to add the following proviso:

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

UMATILLA INDIANS—COLVILLE RESERVATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the regular order according to the resolution passed yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent to present an amendment to a bill; and I should like to make a few remarks, not exceeding five minutes, if I can have the unanimous consent of the Senate for that purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will occupy I think not exceeding three minutes.

The amendment I present is in the nature of a substitute for the bill (S. No. 239) providing for the removal of the Walla Walla, Cayuses, and Umatilla tribes and bands of Indians to a permanent reservation, and to open to settlement the Umatilla reservation in Oregon. It is a matter of so much importance and of such pressing interest that I desire to say a word or two and to quote from a document I hold in my hand which treats of this general subject in a very sensible manner.

The treaty the United States has with these Indians expires in April next. I believe it is considered by everybody who knows anything about the matter, certainly by the Indian department, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by all the agents who have investigated the matter, by all the citizens in our country, and by everybody else, that in the interest of peace on our frontiers, in the interest of the preservation of the lives of both whites and Indians, something should be done at once, at the present session of Congress, looking to the removal of these Indians from their present reservation.

The bill has been pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs for some time. Amendments have been suggested by certain members of the committee from time to time, and also by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I have prepared an embodiment in the paper I hold in my hand of several amendments suggested.

The object of the bill is to provide that the President of the United States shall treat with these Indians, and with their consent remove them to the Colville reservation in Washington Territory. This amendment also provides that it shall be the duty of the commissioners designated by the President to investigate and report upon the advisability and the practicability of enlarging the present Colville Indian reservation. That, however, is but an incidental matter, but I think it very important that it should be in this bill.

The bill as thus amended, the passage of which I propose to insist on, and to which I call the especial attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and that Committee, provides simply that the President shall designate three commissioners who shall treat with these Indians and with their consent remove them to the Colville reservation.

One word or two in regard to the character of the Colville reservation, and as to what kind of a country it is. I present these views in order that this information may be before the Indian Committee. I read from a statement made by a gentleman who is familiar with that whole country, and who has resided in that valley for fifteen years. He says:

Colville Valley at the present time has comparatively few white settlers owing to the fact that the market for its agricultural and other productions is too remote and the means of transportation too limited and expensive to induce a large settlement there. And the few white and half-breed families now living in the valley could, for these reasons, be induced to sell their possessions for a reasonable price to the Government, in case it should be deemed advisable to make the purchase.

That is, to extend the limits of the reservation. The reservation is very large now.

At its last session the Washington Territory Legislature passed a memorial asking the proper authorities of the United States Government to set apart this section of the country as a general reservation for the Indians in the Columbia Valley. This was after mature discussion and a proper consideration of the whole subject of Indian reservations.

I will state that the people who compose the Legislature of Washington Territory know more about Indian matters in that locality than any Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or any Indian agent on this side can possibly know, no matter how intelligent he may be or how much attention he may have given to the general subject.

Again, he says:

In my judgment, it was a wise conclusion at which that Legislature arrived, and if carried out would be alike beneficial to both, the whites and the Indians. The reasons for this belief I now propose to give. The general face of the country embraced within the limits of the proposed reservation is mountainous and hilly, with portions of it timbered. Game, such as deer, elk, bears, &c., is abundant and not difficult to take. The Columbia, the Akinokane, and the Spokane Rivers, with their hundreds of tributary streams interlacing the whole Territory, would afford an inexhaustible supply of salmon and other fish as subsistence for the Indians. Camas—

My friend from Iowa does not know what camas is, I suppose.

Mr. ALLISON. What is it?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is food, bread for the Indians, a root that the Indians eat and live on very often for months.

Camas and other nutritious roots, as well as berries, have from time immemorial been gathered by the Indians in many localities and in the greatest abundance, within the limits of this Territory. And while the land suitable for cultivation is not large, it is amply sufficient to support a population of twenty-five thousand souls.

The Colville Valley, in which the arable land is chiefly found, is about eighty miles in length, and on an average of from two to five in width; of great fertility, capable of raising wheat, oats, barley, and other kinds of grain and vegetables common to Oregon. These can, by proper cultivation, be raised in the greatest abundance. Everything necessary for the subsistence of the Indians is here at hand. Grain and vegetables and fruit for the tillers of the soil; game for the hunters; and fish for the fishers. To all these there is to be added the fur-bearing animals in great abundance for those who should prefer the life of the trapper. This is shown by the report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1873–'74 by which it appears that the Colville Indians were ninth on the list in the quantity of furs produced by Indian tribes. In short the proposed reservation is capable of affording subsistence for thirty or forty thousand inhabitants without any danger of starvation, even though they live in the manner in which Indians are accustomed to live.

The other advantage it would possess for a reservation is its remoteness from the great thoroughfare of travel and trade. With no highway leading through it and no white settlements likely to be in close proximity, there would be but little intercourse between the different races; and great as are its advantages, this in my judgment would be the greatest of all. Isolated from the white settlers and remote from dissolute and depraved men, discord, dissension, and war would cease to exist between them and the Indians. We have seen the evil effects of this encroachment of white settlers upon the borders of Indian reservations in the Modoc and, more recently, in the Nez Percé and Bannack Indian wars; and even now the growing uneasiness and discontent existing between our people and the Indians on the Umatilla reservation show what a sad mistake it was to locate that reservation where it would necessarily be surrounded by the settlements of thriving and industrious farmers. The cattle and other stock of the whites are liable to stray on the unenclosed land of the Indians, and the bands of wild horses belonging to the latter are continuously trespassing upon the farms of the whites. Civilized is beating against savage life, and the inevitable result is sure to follow, discord, dissension, and strife that may end in war. I have recently seen it stated in the public journals that you have recommended in your last report that the Umatilla Indians be removed from their present reservation. This in my judgment is a wise conclusion. That reservation is traversed by many highways, over which merchandise of all kinds is transported every day in the year. Besides, over it is the great overland way to the Pacific coast, over which the United States mails are daily carried. I beg leave, however, to dissent altogether—from the proposal to transfer those Indians to the Yakima reservation. Many of the objections now existing in regard to the Umatilla are applicable to the Yakima reservation. It is in like manner surrounded by white settlers, daily liable to misunderstandings and collisions with the Indians on the reservations. Moreover, the facilities for taking fish and hunting game are not to be compared with those on the Colville reservation; and these after all are what the Indians in their tribal state rely upon for food. Again, the Umatilla and Colville Indians hold the same religious views and have been taught in the same religious faith.

And I will state that the people of Oregon and Washington Territory dissent altogether—

I call the special attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs to that. The Yakimas are Methodists; the Umatillas, Cayuses, and Walla Wallas are Catholics; the Colvilles are under the Catholic denomination, and it would be the height of unwisdom, I think, to undertake to locate these Catholics, the fishing and hunting Indians of the Umatilla reservation, on a reservation where the Methodists, the farming Indians, the Yakimas, are now located.

He says further:

I am fully persuaded that if left to the determination of the Indians themselves—

And the bill proposes to do that—they would far rather be sent to Colville than to the Yakima reservation, and that they would finally be more contented there than in any other place to which they could be sent. This matter of their removal is a matter of most momentous concern as well to the Indians as to the whites.

That is a fact. The war of last year is evidence of this fact. Hundreds of our people have been slaughtered by these very Indians, and occasionally Indians are killed by the whites. Perpetual collisions are occurring there; there is an irrepressible conflict.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Oregon, who is quite familiar with this reservation, to state the reason or occasion of the collisions between the Indians and the white settlers?

Mr. MITCHELL. It would take some time; but I know of no Indian having been injured on the Umatilla reservation by any white man until after a large number of Umatilla Indians, who had been fed and pampered by the Government for twenty years on the Umatilla reservation, had left the reservation and joined the hostiles and committed depredations upon the white settlements surrounding the reservation. This, I admit, so exasperated the white settlers, and justly, too, all over that country that then and after that certain perhaps unjustifiable assaults, and only a very few at that, were committed in a few instances by the whites. But the fact is as I state it, and no man can controvert it, that no interference upon the part of any white settlers with any of the Indians of the Umatilla reservation was had until long after large bodies of these Indians had left the reservation and joined the hostile Snakes and Bannocks and raided that country, all through Eastern Oregon, murdering citizens with impunity, destroying property, and committing destruction and devastation on every hand. That this would naturally lead to perhaps unlawful acts on the part of the whites must be expected.

I beg pardon for taking the time of the Senate with this matter at this time, but it is a subject requiring the immediate attention of Congress. The treaty is about to expire. It is out, I believe, in April. Whatever may be the cause of these collisions, and I am very sure the whites are not the aggressors, they exist, and it is absolutely necessary that the Government should take some steps in the interest of the peace of the country and in the interest of the Indians themselves.

I move the reference of the amendment that I offer to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and hope for an early report.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I have felt, since we have returned after the recess, listening every morning attentively and earnestly to my eloquent and industrious friend from the Pacific coast, almost as if I had lost myself—

In the continuous woods
Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound,
Save his own dashings.

If the Senator has finished this speech, I move that we proceed to the regular order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have finished this morning's speech. I may make one to-morrow morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot help it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will now call the Calendar under the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island adopted yesterday, commencing at the point where its consideration was left off on the former call.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 104) amending section 1661, title 16, (The Militia,) of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better go over, Mr. President. It is a pretty large matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over, and the Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 320) amendatory of the act to incorporate the Capitol, North O street and South Washington Railway Company.

Mr. DORSEY. Let that bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over, and the next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 458) to authorize and equip an expedition to the Arctic seas; which was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President. Fifty thousand dollars will not be a flea bite for such a purpose.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. SARGENT, February 13, 1878.

Mr. CONKLING. I think this bill had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is objected to.

Mr. CONKLING. One citizen of the United States has just, at his own cost, started on an expedition toward the North Pole, and I do not believe that by a bill of these dimensions we had better duplicate it just now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

INDIAN TRUST FUNDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 720) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to deposit in the Treasury of the United States any and all sums now held by him, or which may hereafter be received by him, as Secretary of the Interior and trustee of various Indian tribes, on account of the redemption of United States bonds, or other stocks and securities belonging to the Indian trust fund, whenever he is of the opinion that the best interests of the Indians will be promoted by such deposits, in lieu of investments; and provides that the United States shall pay interest semi-annually at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the date of deposit of any and all such sums in the Treasury.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment; which was, in line 9, after the word "trust fund," to strike out:

Whenever he is of the opinion that the best interests of the Indians will be promoted by such deposits, in lieu of investments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that bill explained a little before it passes. According to my recollection a good share of these trust funds consists of trusts raised under treaties which provide specifically as to how the investment shall be made and the rate of interest that it shall bear. Now, whether this act would conform to the provisions of those treaties, I should like to know before I am asked to vote for it.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill was reported by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] who is absent. I do not think the bill will conflict with any existing Indian treaty. I know of no treaty that requires specific investments in particular securities. It has latterly been the custom from time to time to invest in United States securities, and a number of investments were made in 6 per cent. bonds. Those bonds, of course, have been called in some instances, and the money is now in the Treasury. Generally the Indian treaties require the Government to pay 5 per cent. interest, and therefore 5 per cent. interest was inserted as the rate to be paid annually to these Indians under treaty stipulations. I know of no instance where a higher rate of interest is required, although it may be possible that there may be some existing treaty where a higher rate of interest is required. If so, the Government would be obliged to pay it.

Mr. WITHERS. Suppose there should be a lower rate?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no lower rate fixed in any Indian treaty.

Mr. BECK. Does not this bill really fix the rate of interest at 5 per cent.?

Mr. ALLISON. It fixes the rate of interest at 5 per cent. I think in nearly every instance where the Government has trust funds of the Indians, and the rate of interest is prescribed by treaty, it is prescribed at 5 per cent.

Mr. BECK. Is this a general provision?

Mr. ALLISON. A general provision. The object is to take money now in the Treasury, which has been put there on account of trust funds arising from an investment in 6 per cent. bonds or, from time to time, from 5 per cent. bonds, which have been called, and instead of reinvesting it in bonds of the United States, that the same shall go into the Treasury and become an annuity, as it were, and the interest only be payable to the Indians from time to time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Where provision is already made for 6 per cent., does the bill propose to reduce it to 5 per cent.?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not so understand the bill. If it does it ought to be amended in that particular. Of course where we have a treaty stipulation with an Indian tribe that we shall invest their funds at 6 per cent., we cannot by law get rid of that obligation, and I take it in such cases there would be no paying the money into the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This bill would not reach it? Then I submit to the Senator whether, as 4 per cent. is now the fixed rate of interest of the Government and no bond is being issued at 5 per cent., the rate in the bill ought not to be 4 for all future investments and any investments covered by this bill? This bill, as I understand, does not at all affect any treaty stipulation. It is a general bill in regard to funds where there is no stipulation in the treaty with the Indians what amount of interest shall be paid. That being the case, I submit to the Senator whether it would not be proper to make the rate of interest 4 per cent. instead of 5, from the fact that that is the legal interest of the Government to-day or that at which we are selling bonds?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course any funds that come under the operation of this bill must come into the Treasury under treaty stipulations. There is now no provision in any treaty that I know of justifying a rate of interest less than 5 per cent. Of course there are Indian treaties that provide no particular rate of interest, but require us to invest the funds.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator know of any treaty which requires the United States to pay 5 per cent. or any other specific rate of interest?

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot of course point the Senator from Wisconsin to any particular treaty at this moment; but I know there are a great number of treaties by which we are specifically required to pay 5 per cent. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. CHAFFEE] just now calls my attention to a recent treaty with the Utes where we have expressly stipulated to pay 5 per cent. for thirty years. I think in nearly all the treaties, or in a great number of them at least, we have stipulated to pay 5 per cent.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to inquire, would it not be better and safer to amend the bill so as to require the United States to pay 5 per cent. where 5 per cent. is demanded by the existing treaties, and where no specific rate of interest is demanded, than to accept the suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia, and to pay such rate of interest as we get money for from other sources?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know of any special objection to that amendment; but when this bill was reported to the Senate we were not in the happy financial condition that we find ourselves in now. We were then borrowing money at 4½ per cent. instead of 4 per cent. I think the Committee on Indian Affairs thought it not wise to provide a general rate. If Senators think it is better to make 4 per cent. the rate of interest in cases where treaty stipulations do not require a particular rate, I do not know that I have any objection to it.

I will say that this bill meets the approval of the present Secretary of the Interior, and it met the approval of his immediate predecessor, who prepared it and sent it to the committee for action.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, one thing I think we ought to keep in mind about this subject that, if we deal with it as we do sometimes with other matters about the Indians, we are quite likely to forget; and that is that a treaty with an Indian tribe is just as binding upon the honor and good faith and justice of the United States as a treaty with any other body, nation, State, or prince. If I have stated that as an axiom to which everybody will agree, the question is about disturbing these trust funds that are invested and falling in and so forth, whether such a change as this bill proposes will disturb our promises and the duties that we have entered into under any treaty.

I think it will be found on looking up the matter that nearly every one of the treaties that provides for trust funds makes the United States a trustee with the duty of investing these funds which belong to the Indians, their money, and of investing them in safe stocks and securities to the best advantage. If that be so, and I feel quite confident that it is, then it is the duty of the United States to perform this office of trustee faithfully and diligently, and to get the largest interest for the beneficiary, the real owner of the money, that it can get, consistent with the safety of the investment.

I take it that everybody who hears me will agree that I state simply the law, and justice as well, when I say that. It would follow if I am right about that, indisputably follow, that if the United States, through its executive authority, can invest the money of these Indians at a rate of interest above 5 per cent. and have it safe, then the United States ought to do it. In that case the trustee has no business to take the money and say "I will use the money myself and pay a lower interest than I can get from some other safe borrower." I take it that is plain.

I am very much afraid, therefore, that the very structure of the bill which authorizes, and if the amendment be agreed to, requires, the Secretary of the Interior to turn all this money, as fast as these loans fall in, into the Treasury at 5 per cent., is an infraction of the largest part of these trust treaties, and is such a denial of the right of the beneficiary as if it should occur between private persons or private corporations, would call for and justify the intervention of a court of justice to compel the trustee to perform his duty.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, the treaties generally provide for 5 per cent. interest to be paid by the Government of the United States. It has been the custom latterly, to invest in United States bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest, and in some instances 6 per cent. bonds were purchased during the years of the war, and the years following the war; but now 5 per cent. bonds are above par. We have stipulated to pay 5 per cent. interest. We cannot invest in bonds; therefore the object of this bill is to provide that in all such cases, and indeed in all cases where we hold trust funds, the rate of interest shall be fixed at 5 per cent., and that there shall be no issuance of bonds in relation to such funds whatever, no opportunity of stealing bonds.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to inquire whether our treaties require the United States to pay 5 per cent. interest, or whether different treaties require an investment in certain bonds? A treaty compact which requires an investment in a 5 per cent. bond of the United States is a very different thing from one which requires the United States to pay 5 per cent. interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me to say that these Indian treaties are almost as varied as their number, in reference to these provisions. The earlier treaties required the Government of the United States to become the trustee of the Indians and to invest their funds in the best possible manner in sound securities; and in the exercise of that power the Secretary of the Interior in 1859–'60 invested some million or more of dollars of these Indian trust funds in worthless State securities—in State securities that to-day are not worth twenty cents on the dollar—and yet the Government of the United States has felt itself bound by treaty stipulations to make that loss good to the Indians; and we have paid interest at the rate of 5 and 6 per cent. upon the principal of the Indian trust funds thus invested for more than twenty years in some cases.

Some of the later treaties provide for a specific rate of interest, namely, 5 per cent. Some others contain the provision of the older treaties, namely, the best possible investment for the Indians. Of course when you put any fund in trust you must see that the principal is preserved, as well as the annual interest paid; and therefore the committee thought that it was for the interest of the Indian tribes that we should provide that their funds should remain in the Treasury of the United States, and that we should pay an annual interest to them.

Now, if there is any defect in this bill I am quite ready to correct it. I will only say to the Senator from Vermont and other Senators that there are considerable sums of money now lying in the Treasury uninvested, and this money ought to be invested from time to time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we are bound to pay interest on it at either 5 or 6 per cent., it does not make any difference to the Indians, or to us either, whether you call it invested or what you do with it if it is there. But I thought that I was yielding to a question instead of yielding to my honorable friend to explain the bill, as I had not quite finished what I wanted to say.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg the Senator's pardon for trespassing on his time, which I did not mean to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If this is a trust, then, as I have said, the duty of the trustee is plain enough; and that is that, without reference to the private gain and advantage of the trustee, but with reference to the best advantage of the benficiary, the investment should be made at the highest rate of interest that can be got consistent with safety. Now, suppose that the duty is to pay 5 per cent., as in a large majority of the instances under the treaties probably it is. I think fixing the same sum would not be an infraction of the treaty as to the Indians; but the United States can borrow money at less than 5 per cent. If there are States or corporations or private borrowers to whom a trustee can with safety lend money that are willing to pay 5 per cent. or more, then it is for the interest of the United States not to take up this fund and pay 5 per cent. upon it, but to borrow money on its own great credit for less than 5 per cent., and loan out this money for its beneficiary at the best rate it can get, 5 per cent. if you please. In that case the 1 per cent., if we can borrow at 4, does not come out, as a loss, of the Treasury of the United States, but it is money that comes out of the other borrower for the benefit of the Indian, whereas if we borrow it ourselves at a rate of interest which is above the rate that our credit entitles us to borrow at, it is a clear loss to us. That view ought not to be lost sight of.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me right there, we exercised just that discretion in the case of Mr. Thompson, Secretary of the Interior, and under it we lost the principal and have been paying interest for nearly twenty years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we lose the principal through the misconduct of any officer of ours, then probably good faith to the Indians would require that it should be made up. If we lose it through the accidents of business and under the exercise of due diligence, which the trustee is bound to exercise, then no moral or legal obligation would rest upon us to make it good. I have not the time just now to go back and try Mr. Secretary Thompson to ascertain whether he was guilty or not guilty of wrong in what he did in lending this money to some State that repudiated, or in running away with the amount, if that was the case. I only venture to speak in the interest of that justice and fair play which we are bound to exercise toward a red man just as much as toward a white man if we have promised to do it; and in that view I wish to ask my honorable friend from Iowa whether he would object to, or whether he would not be satisfied with, an amendment at the end of this bill of this character:

> But nothing in this act shall authorize the infraction of the provisions of any treaty or agreement with any Indian tribe or band.

So that wherever a treaty binds us to do something else, let us do as we have promised we will do.

Mr. ALLISON. I not only will not object to it, but if such a provision is necessary in order to protect the rights of which the Senator speaks, and which the committee have quite as much in view as the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt that.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be necessary, I trust the amendment will be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the amendment in form offered?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir, but there is a preceding amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Iowa to state,—no doubt he can in a word,—what the present difficulty is in acting as custodian of this fund.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand, there are a number of treaties that require investments which shall bear a certain rate of interest. Now, when a number of the bonds already invested were paid off, it was impossible to reinvest the proceeds at par and thus provide the necessary rate of interest.

Mr. CONKLING. Which was what?

Mr. ALLISON. Five per cent., the 5 per cent. bonds being above par. The object of this bill, which was presented at the last session—and my attention has not been called to it since that time—was to require the Secretary of the Interior to turn that money into the Treasury, and require the Treasury to pay 5 per cent. interest on it, instead of taking the Indian trust funds and investing them in United States bonds—5 per cent. bonds—bearing a premium. That is the object of this bill. If it does not effectuate that object, it ought not to pass.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator to take the case of a treaty which guarantees to Indians on their trust fund interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and to say that, in order to make that assurance sure, he proposes to cover the money into the Treasury, and then have the 5 per cent. go, absolutely regardless of what may be the rise or the fall of the market in particular securities.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the exact object, and no other.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I may say that if the bill does effectuate that which the Senator states, and does nothing more, every Senator will be for it. It is a very important matter, however, and some of the Senators at least ought to be very sure that it is right before we act upon it. I understand my friend from Iowa to say that although at the last session he knew about this, at this session he has not had his attention directed to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean that I knew the exact amount of the funds as they stood then. There was then $400,000 and over of these different funds belonging to half a dozen tribes of Indians. I can never be more accurate in my own judgment that this bill ought to pass in the interest of the Indian tribes and in justice to them. It meets the approval of the Department, the present Secretary of the Interior and his predecessor. It met the unanimous approval of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it does seem to me there can be no objection to it unless some Senator can make one that I have not yet heard.

I quite agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, and I think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont, if agreed to, will leave the bill in that shape, as I understand it, that then all funds belonging to the Indians will be in the Treasury, and all the funds where no greater rate of interest is prescribed by treaty than 5 per cent. will draw 5 per cent. Where a greater rate of interest is reserved in the treaty a greater rate of interest will be paid. Now, I agree very heartily with the Senator from Vermont that the United States ought to keep faith with an Indian tribe as much as with one of its own citizens. So I concur with him that when we have agreed to pay 6 or 10 per cent. to an Indian tribe we should pay 6 or 10 per cent. until the debt falls due; but where we have not agreed to pay either 6 or 5 per cent., where is the obligation in law or in ethics which requires us to borrow money of an Indian tribe at a higher rate of interest than we can borrow money of anybody else?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not maintain that there is; and I stated distinctly exactly the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I also said in that case if we were a trustee and the money was not ours we had no business, being the trustee, to borrow this money of our beneficiaries at a low rate of interest because our credit was good, if we could invest at a higher rate of interest in a safe security of somebody else.

Mr. HOWE. Ay, but the bill commands that the money lie in the Treasury and we pay 5 per cent. for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not favoring that part of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. That part of the bill seemed to stand without objection from the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out "five" and insert "four," as the rate of interest.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky that there is a committee amendment pending to be acted upon before the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BECK. Then, without making that motion now, I desire to say that the Senator from Iowa has expressly told us that this bill is not to interfere with any treaty stipulation and has very properly consented to an amendment to that effect. Therefore it only applies to such moneys as the United States has in its possession and under its control, and the interest provided for applies to that character of funds. It is very obvious that the experiment which we have made to act as trustees and loan out money to States has not been very beneficial either to the United States or to the Indians, and I am not willing to say that the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else shall have the right to loan that money out to corporations, or individuals, or States, as it is suggested may possibly be done. I do not know to whom he would lend it. I know some places where it might be put to do a great deal of good in the estimation of some people, with campaign committees or "visiting statesmen;" but the principal might not be safe and the interest might not be returned. As we have to take care of the money, and have no agent authorized to loan it and no one to whom it is safe to intrust it, certainly not without an order of Congress as to how it shall be loaned and upon what security, and it is not proposed by Congress to loan it at all, why should the United States pay more now for money in the Treasury to Indians with whom she has no treaty requiring a specific amount than she can borrow from all the other people of the United States? We are obtaining from five to six or eight million dollars a day on 4 per cent. bonds at par, and if hereafter the United States cannot obtain money at as low a rate of interest as 4 per cent. changes may be made; but so long as money is worth only 4 per cent., and these funds are deposited in the Treasury and the United States has to take care of them in the absence of any agent whom she can trust to loan them out, she ought not to pay more interest than the money is worth to her and than she can obtain it from any citizen.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa invites any Senator to whom an objection occurs to state it, and, therefore, I will venture upon two suggestions about this bill.

In the first place I do not understand to what fund this money is to go in the Treasury Department. Does the Senator from Iowa understand?

Mr. ALLISON. It is to be covered into the Treasury. I do not know that it belongs to any special fund.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator says that it is covered into the Treasury. That was my apprehension at first. It is not my understanding after reading the bill, that it is covered into the Treasury, within the meaning of that term as commonly employed in the Senate. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior "to deposit in the Treasury of the United States any and all sums now held by him." "To deposit;" that is not covering money into the Treasury, and by reason of a distinction which the Senator from Iowa, even better than I, fully understands. If by law you cover money into the Treasury, long practical construction has established the nature of the thing you do; but if you authorize a deposit, whether of money or bonds or swords—for there has been the deposit of swords authorized in the Treasury Department—you authorize a transaction of a different nature. So I think the Senator from Iowa will have occasion to answer to himself to what fund, if to any fund, such a deposit would go. If it is to be a special deposit of dead money, so to speak, in the Treasury Department, on which interest is to be paid, that is one thing. If it is to be covered into the Treasury generally, to be disposable like the other funds belonging to the coffers of the United States, that is quite a different thing. I venture to make that as the first suggestion which occurs to me.

But another thing strikes me which has been already adverted to, in part at least, and strikes me with more force. According to my recollection, the Indian treaties may in this respect be divided into three classes. There are treaties which provide for the payment of 5 per cent. interest on trust funds; that is one class. There are other treaties which I think provide for the payment of interest, but at a different rate than 5 per cent. I am not prepared to be exact or even positive as to the fact now, but I think it will turn out that there are specifications of interest to be paid to Indians which specification is not 5 per cent. My impression is in one or two cases above that, and possibly sometimes below it. There is a third class of treaties in this respect, and my recollection is more numerous than either of the other two classes,—treaties in which the United States engages to invest and keep invested for the interest, or possibly the term is for the best interest of the other party to the treaty, the funds belonging to them. Now, speaking of the latter class of treaties every lawyer will understand the obligation which they create. The United States is bound in that case to do what a prudent individual would do in the investment of his own funds, bound to do what a court of chancery would direct an executor or trustee to do in the interest of his or their cestui que trusts. In other words the duty of the Government would be to make that investment which being safe, defensible in that respect, would yield the largest increase of interest. Now by what right one party to this agreement, (for such a treaty is,) without consultation with the other, may set down and determine arbitrarily by an ipse dixit that 5 per cent., not only this month and this year, but hereafter in all years shall be that sum which the law would exact in the fulfillment of such a contract, I do not understand. It may be 5 per cent. now; it may be 5 per cent. next year; or as the Senator from Kentucky has suggested next year 4 per cent. may be all that money safely invested can be made to yield; or on the other hand 6 per cent. may be the current value of money ventured in safe investments. But whichever way the variation may be, the rule of law and the rule of ethics all the time exacts one thing from the custodian, one thing from the trustee, that his investment shall be that particular investment, which being safe will pay the largest sum to the ultimate owner of this money.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask a question now?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I have here a treaty provision that comes under one of the heads named by the Senator. I wish to read it to him:

> The residue of said $57,500 on hand after the payments hereinbefore provided shall have been made shall remain as a trust fund, the interest upon which, as well as the interest that may have accrued on the portion drawn out, shall be applied under the direction of the President to educational or other beneficial purposes among the Iowas.

There is a provision for interest, no provision for a rate of interest; but it requires that the interest shall be annually paid. In that case I ask the Senator what injustice would be done?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Here is another of a different character. Here is article 13 of the treaty of 1855 with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, which says on this point:

> The funds now held in trust by the United States for the benefit of the Choctaws under former treaties or otherwise shall continue to be so held, together with the sum of $500,000 out of the amount payable to them under articles 8 and 10 of this agreement, and also whatever balance shall remain, if any, of the amount that shall be allowed the Choctaws by the Senate under the twelfth article hereof. The sums so to be held in trust shall constitute a general Choctaw fund yielding an annual interest of not less than 5 per cent.

Implying just what the Senator from New York has said, that the duty of the trustee was to get more if he could.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not in classifying these treaties include, because I did not remember, any such treaty as the Senator from Iowa has read. There is a treaty provision in the nature of a recital merely; the interest is referred to not there by way of stipulation of amount, but merely for the purpose of giving direction to that interest, of stating what shall become of it; and so it is said of this sum, namely the interest, that it shall under the direction of the President be applied so and so. Of course we all see the distinction between that provision and the other provision in that treaty, if there is one, by which the United States stipulates to pay. That merely recites the interest to state what shall be done with it.

But now the Senator from Vermont reads a provision which does belong to one of the classes of treaties of which I spoke and possibly to two of those classes. He reads a provision which makes 5 per cent. the minimum—not the rate agreed upon, but the minimum. In other words, the United States by that treaty guarantees to the Indians that this trust fund shall yield at least 5 per cent. interest. Now, I infer the Senator from Iowa will say in that case—and I am not disposed to contend with him—that it would be a fair execution of that provision for the United States at this time, for example finding that 5 per cent. is all that money can be made to yield in safe investments, to cover this money into the Treasury and say we will pay as an annuity or whatever you please to call it 5 per cent. There is a case that at this time this provision would fairly hit and fairly meet. But when you come to a future time for this same case, or when you come to one of the other cases we have been speaking of at this time, the question still confronts us whether that is a fair mode of meeting the obligation.

The Senator from Vermont proposes to add to the bill, as I read it:

> But nothing in this act shall authorize the infraction of the provisions of any treaty or agreement with any Indian tribe or band.

It is a good amendment, but I am inclined to think it is too good for the purpose of this bill, because it must operate in every instance where by treaty the United States is bound to pay some different rate to except and reserve that at all events from the operation of the bill, whereas the bill is general in its terms and promiscuous and indiscriminate in including all the cases. So I would suggest that as a mode of making that amendment appropriately a part of the bill the cases, if there are such, in which it would violate a treaty ought not to be upon the face of the measure included and then reserved by a general reservation, and left hereafter to be picked out or scuffled out or contended out by these parties before the Departments or before a court.

I judge from a gesture of the Chair that I am exceeding the time. If I am, I will yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time within which this call of the Calendar should proceed has expired. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Calendar has had no day during this session, and I ask my friend from New Hampshire if he is willing to lay aside his bill and go on with the Calendar?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I consent that the Calendar shall be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire gives his consent. The Chair hears no objection to the Calendar being proceeded with. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. Having concluded, I will not trespass further.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, which will be reported.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say a word on that amendment. If the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] shall be adopted——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not yet been offered. It was simply suggested.

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to say that if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky shall be adopted, then the amendment proposed by the committee should not be, because there should be some discretion left then in the Secretary of the Interior whether or not he should invest in 4 per cent. bonds.

I desire to say, while I am up, that this question of the rate of interest is one of no little difficulty, as has been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] Nearly three years ago this identical bill passed the Senate without material objection, perhaps without very much discussion. It passed the Senate and went to the House during the last Congress, and the House inserted the provision proposed now by the Senator from Kentucky, namely, that the rate of interest instead of being 5 per cent. should be 4; and the bill fell during the last Congress between the two Houses, because the rate of interest could not be agreed upon. Now, if it is the judgment of the Senate that in cases where we are not bound to pay a specific rate of interest we fairly comply with our obligation by the payment of 4 per cent. interest, then so be it. But I do think that it is best for the Government and for the Indian tribes that their trust funds should be invested in funds of the Government, and that no Secretary of the Interior, however wise or able or honest he may be, should be intrusted with the power to go outside of Government securities and make investment for these Indian tribes; because, whether that investment be made carelessly, improvidently, or dishonestly, justice to the Indians will require that hereafter we shall make that investment good. We have done it in every instance. I see now the Senator from Tennessee; before Secretaries of the Interior have invested in securities in his State, supposing that they were safe securities, as they were at the time, but by reason of the insolvency of corporations in which the investments were made the securities have become absolutely worthless. Probably at the time they were regarded as judicious investments, but they failed, and the Government of the United States is to-day paying interest on those investments, and those securities are lying in the vaults of the Secretary of the Interior as so much waste paper.

Now, I think it is wise for us to fix a fair rate of interest that we will pay semi-annually to these Indian tribes, whether it be 5 per cent. or 4 per cent. But let it be understood that the Government itself becomes responsible for these Indian trust funds, and that they are as sacred in the hands of this Government as are any other obligations of the Government. If we do that, I think we shall have no difficulty in the future.

I have read one of the treaty stipulations with reference to this matter, which requires, if it requires anything, that we shall pay interest upon $57,500. Those funds are still in existence, and we are now paying 5 per cent. interest. I believe those funds have been invested in 5 per cent. bonds, though I am not quite clear about that; but if they have been so invested, or if they have been invested in other bonds and those bonds should be paid off, the Government could not reinvest in bonds bearing that high rate of interest. It seems to me that we may reasonably, and that we are bound honorably, to fix a rate which we will pay to those Iowas on those $57,500. Are we not bound? There is no rate specified; yet we have agreed to pay them interest. Certainly in that particular case 5 per cent. is a reasonable rate; or it may be that 4 per cent. is enough, because just at this moment we can borrow money at 4 per cent., but next year we may be obliged to pay 6. But a 5 per cent. rate of interest, it seems to me, is reasonable.

That is the object of this bill. If it has any other object it has been so carefully concealed that I have been unable to see it for three years, although it has come up frequently for the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I leave it for the judgment of the Senate, having in view our duty under the various treaty obligations to provide these funds and keep them sacred.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, all seem to be agreed that where the United States has agreed to pay 5, or 6, or any other given rate of interest, this bill, or any bill upon the subject, should provide for paying that rate of interest. So far all are agreed. I think there will be no substantial disagreement on the proposition just made by the Senator from Iowa that there should not be vested in any officer of this Government discretionary power to loan any trust funds in our possession to anybody. It is a discretion which I think ought not to be given to any officer of the Government. So I think the Senate will conclude, with the Senator from Iowa, that this money, all of these funds, should be in the Treasury. Being in the Treasury, we are agreed that where a specific rate of interest is stipulated for that shall be paid. If we can agree what rate of interest shall be paid where no specific rate is now prescribed by law or treaty, then a simple amendment to this bill, providing that these funds be deposited in the Treasury and that the Treasury pay on such funds as require 5 per cent. or 6 per cent. that rate of interest, and on other funds the rate we agree to, will make the bill conform to what we shall finally conclude is right.

Now, then, what ought we to pay on funds where no specific rate is prescribed? Five per cent. is suggested by the bill. I think that is unreasonable, for the simple reason that we can borrow and are borrowing millions daily at 4 per cent. It is not right. We cannot in justice to the Indians pay off this debt now, because we cannot trust the money in their hands. If we could we could settle that question right here by borrowing the money and paying them. It is not right to require us to keep these funds without limitation of time and to pay a rate of interest above that at which we borrow in all the markets of the world. So it seems to me that if to-day we agree to pay them 4 per cent. where we have already agreed to pay nothing higher, and take care to reserve in the bill precisely upon all other funds what the law now prescribes, we shall have done all that our duty requires of us for the Indians.

Mr. MAXEY. The phraseology of the various treaties, especially those made since 1866, in regard to trust funds differs. The third article of the treaty with the Choctaws, referred to by the Senator from Vermont, requires the fund there provided for to be invested at not less than 5 per cent. I do not remember any other treaty that uses that expression except the Choctaw treaty; and yet all these treaties require the trust fund to be invested at 5 per cent., with the exception of one. I call the attention of the Senate to a clause in the Creek treaty, and I do not see how you can get rid of paying 5 per cent. there:

> The residue of said fund shall be retained in the Treasury of the United States, upon which interest at the rate of 5 per cent. shall annually be paid for the maintenance and support of said school.

There it is fixed in the treaty, and therefore it cannot be reached. The wording of the Cherokee treaty differs from either of the others that I have examined. The Choctaws and Chickasaws are covered together; the Seminoles and Creeks follow the same rule. The Cherokee treaty of 1866, article 23, reads thus:

> All funds now due the nation, or that may hereafter accrue from the sale of their lands by the United States, as hereinbefore provided for, shall be invested in United States registered stocks at their current value, and the interest on all said funds shall be paid semi-annually on the order of the Cherokee Nation, and shall be applied to the following purposes, &c.

There the trust fund must be invested in bonds at their current value at that time, 1866, and the lowest interest then was 5 per cent. As this interest was to be paid annually, and the money was to be invested in those bonds at that time, can the United States, who is the trustee, get rid of that rate of 5 per cent. interest by calling in the very bonds in which that trust fund was invested? It occurs to me that it would be difficult to do that, and more especially when you look at the Creek treaty, which distinctly requires that—

> The residue of said fund shall be retained—
> Not invested in bonds of any kind, but—> retained in the Treasury of the United States, upon which interest at the rate of 5 per cent. shall annually be paid for the maintenance and support of said school.

Now, this bill provides:

> That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to deposit in the Treasury of the United States any and all sums now held by him, or which may hereafter be received by him, as Secretary of the Interior and trustee of various Indian tribes, on account of the redemption of United States bonds.

The Cherokee fund was invested in registered bonds of the United States, then drawing 5 per cent. interest. Those bonds have been called in or are liable to be called in. Can the United States get rid of the then rate of interest by calling in those bonds, and would that be equitable to the cestui que trust by the act of the trustee? It is a legal question. I should dislike to say that a trustee could do it, especially when you look at another treaty made during the same summer of 1866 with another tribe, in which the money is required to be retained in the Treasury and the interest annually paid to the cestui que trust.

I take it that the general theory of all these treaties must be the same, and when you come to examine all of them, wherever a rate of interest is fixed at all it is fixed at 5 per cent. Therefore I think myself that as the United States is required to keep this fund in trust, she is equitably bound to pay the rate of interest which was agreed upon at the date of the treaties when the United States was made the trustee. These people are weak and helpless. As a matter of course Congress has the power to put it down to 4 per cent., but of all people on this earth I would rather deal harshly with the most powerful nation than to deal harshly or inequitably with these people who are struggling to get into a position of civilization. I feel that it would be right, equitable, and just, and would promote good feeling on the part of these people toward the United States, to continue to pay the rate of interest which was incorporated in the treaties, which is 5 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, after the word "trust fund," it is to strike out—

> Whenever he is of the opinion that the best interests of the Indians will be promoted by such deposits, in lieu of investments.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 22, no 1; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I presume it is given up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is an amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWE. There is a quorum in the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Chair to count the Senate and see if a quorum is here. That is the shortest way; it will save calling the roll.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will count the Senate. [Counting.] There is a quorum present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I give it up. I voted in the negative. Let the amendment be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is adopted. The next amendment is that proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] which will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add:

But nothing in this act shall authorize the infraction of the provisions of any treaty or agreement with any Indian tribe or band.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments?

Mr. BECK. I move to strike out "five" and insert "four" as the rate of interest.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky and more especially since the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, which in fact excludes all treaty stipulations, so that the bill only refers to funds now in the Treasury or hereafter to be invested. Surely, then, there can be no objection on account of treaties stipulating differently. In other words the 4 per cent. will not in any way affect any treaty now in existence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. It seems to me that to fix the rate of 4 per cent. is cutting it rather fine for these Indians just at this moment. It is true that that is the rate at which the Government can now borrow money; but most of the treaties provide for 5 per cent. and some of them for not less than 5 per cent. Now to invest in Government bonds at the rate of 4 per cent. in all cases where there is no specific rate provided, it seems to me as hardly fair at this time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suppose the Senator agrees that wherever the rate of interest is named by treaty or otherwise this amendment does not in any way affect it.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course, where a specific rate is provided, that governs.

Mr. MAXEY. Is there any trust fund held by the United States outside of a treaty?

Mr. ALLISON. None that I know of.

Mr. BECK. The naval pension fund of fourteen millions is an instance.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not held for Indian tribes.

Mr. MAXEY. I spoke of trust funds held for Indians, and asked if there were any such outside of treaty stipulations.

Mr. ALLISON. The naval pension fund I believe is held at 3 per cent. There are a number of treaties that provide for the rate of interest. Now, just at this moment it is proposed that we shall by law provide the lowest rate that the Government is obliged to pay. I confess for myself in the interest of the Indians I think it would be better for the Government to continue to pay the rate it is now paying. The Government is now paying at the rate of 5 per cent. where no other rate is stipulated, and I think that is a fair rate for the Indian tribes and for this Government for one year or taking a series of years. The committee believed that 5 per cent. was a reasonable rate; 4½ might possibly do; but to reduce these Indian trust funds now to the lowest possible rate of interest at which the Government can borrow money, it seems to me, is hardly fair to them.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky to modify his amendment as I suggest. After the word "at," in the twelfth line, insert:

Such rate as may be fixed by treaty, and where no rate has been fixed by treaty at 4 per cent. per annum.

So as to read:

And the United States shall pay interest at such rate as may be fixed by treaty, and where no rate has been fixed by treaty at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that except that the amendment just adopted by the Senate, at the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, provides precisely what the Senator from Tennessee desires to have inserted in the bill. Then with my proposition it means exactly what the Senator from Tennessee suggests, for we have just adopted an amendment saying that the provision we here make in regard to interest shall not in any way affect any provision which is regulated by treaty, so that we are only dealing with those cases that are not in any way connected with a treaty or provided for by one.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to say that if he is right in his construction as to the amendment just adopted proposed by the Senator from Vermont, then it is perfectly satisfactory to me; but I am not sure that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, while it will certainly have the effect the Senator from Kentucky supposes it to have, may not go further. I am inclined to think it will also operate on the deposit of the fund itself. For instance, where the treaty requires the investment of the fund at a rate not to be lower than 5 per cent., the amendment we have adopted will so operate as to prevent the deposit of that fund in the Treasury at all, or it may be construed to require the Secretary of the Interior still to invest it in securities as best he may at a rate not below 5 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. That would be the exact effect if we now adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. What will be the effect, if the Senator from Iowa pleases?

Mr. ALLISON. That all the 5 per cent. funds will not be touched by the bill.

Mr. BECK. That the 5 per cent. funds provided by treaty will not be affected by the bill. That is precisely what I propose. It is only as to those funds which the United States undertakes to take care of, where no person has any right to a given sum, that I suggest 4 per cent. I hope the Senator from Tennessee understands me as meaning to do just what he supposes the amendment of the Senator from Vermont effects in cases covered by treaty.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to state a case?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I find here a treaty with the Kansas Indians which provides that a sum of $202,000 "shall be funded at 5 per cent., the interest of which shall be paid annually," &c. There is a requirement to fund the principal sum at 5 per cent. Of course that would allow it to be put in United States bonds, and when they were bought at par that would be the way they would be funded; but now, when those bonds are at a premium, it is impossible for the Government of the United States, without some additional law, to fund this sum at 5 per cent. They must pay a premium in order to do it. Now, under the bill as it is, without the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, the Government complies with this treaty provision; it does fund the money at 5 per cent. and pays the interest; but under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky the Government, unless there is a further modification of the bill, would still be entitled to pay a premium in order to get 5 per cent. on this fund. Now, the question is whether that is fair and just to the Indian tribes? Every Senator will judge for himself.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. I understood him to say that wherever a treaty provision fairly construed requires the payment of 5 per cent., he thinks it right that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont should operate. In other words, he thinks it would be bad faith to apply a 4 per cent. provision to such cases.

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree with the Senator entirely, and upon that concession I found my question. What does the Senator from Kentucky say of the case of a treaty which fixes no rate of interest, but which requires the United States to invest at the best and most profitable rate? Speaking of such case, not for to-day, but as a permanent statute is intended to speak hereafter, does the Senator from Kentucky think it would be a fair execution of the trust to fix 4 per cent. interest to operate and be the measure of interest when the time comes that manifestly an investment for more than 4 per cent. could be made, and if he sees a distinction between the two cases what is the distinction?

Mr. BECK. In answer to that I would say that where we have undertaken to manage this trust fund, when we see that it is impossible to authorize any executive officer to loan it out so as to absolutely secure the principal as well as the interest, and when Congress believes that the true way to give absolute security to the principal, which is quite as valuable as to secure a fair interest, requires us to keep the fund in the Treasury, then at the time we pass the law it is now proposed to pass we ought to pay precisely the same interest to the Indians that we are willing to pay on our own bonds or to any person else from whom we borrow. Four per cent. is admitted to be that amount now. It may be 6 per cent. two years hence. If so I would then change it and give the Indians the same that I gave any person else. It may be 3 per cent., not 6. Congress being in session each year can so change the rate of interest allowed as to do justice to the Indian. I would put them precisely on the same footing that I would any other creditor of the Government, and pay them just the rate of interest the money is worth.

Mr. CONKLING. In other words, as I understand it, the Senator from Kentucky is compelled to maintain two propositions: first, that Congress shall, by legislation watching the money market, legislate from time to time so as to conform to the ebb and flow of money values. I think the argument of convenience, without going further, would be strong against that. But the Senator from Kentucky is compelled to maintain a very difficult position. Reducing the transaction to more familiar form, it is one between two individuals. One individual has become trustee for another, under a decree or covenant to keep the funds of the other invested to the best advantage. The trustee proposes, instead of executing his trust, to take the moneys to himself, to become himself the borrower, to fix the rate of interest himself which he will pay, and do it without consulting the other party.

I ask whether there is a forum of law or a forum of reason on earth in which such a transaction would stand investigation? The rule of law as to a trustee is "touch not, taste not, handle not, but observe absolutely the requirements of your trust." What are they? To keep invested from time to time and always at the best advantage funds with which the trustee has nothing whatever to do except scrupulously to act as the legal custodian. Is there any theory of trusteeship under which the trustee can determine for himself that he will become the borrower; that he will become one of the interested parties, that he by his own act will make himself a contractor, not with the consent of the other party, but upon his own volition, determining everything for himself and saying when complaint is made, "Why if at a future time I judge that I should pay more interest, then I will pay more interest; if at a future time it seems to me I should not pay so much interest, then I will not pay so much interest?"

The vice, as I conceive, in such a proposition is radical. You do not defend it by finding that on a particular day the trustee at that time is doing what he should do in fact as to rendering the amount to the other. You do not defend it in that way, because it is a violation of law, it is a violation of the covenant. The difficulty with it is ethical; it is wrong; and the circumstance that on a particular day an investigation might show that just at that time the trustee happened to be paying out of his own pocket and by his own volition as much as anybody else would pay is no answer.

Mr. President, I want to make one other remark about this bill. The Senator from West Virginia construes the bill as it now stands to mean that it shall take no effect upon treaty moneys, but that it shall operate only on moneys which find themselves or are found, without reference to this law, in the Treasury of the United States, and speaking of such cases it says that the interest paid on them shall be 5 per cent., or 4 per cent., or whatever rate shall be established. Assuming that to be the correct construction of the bill as it now stands, I submit to the Senate that the legislation is unworthy of the Senate in substance and in form, unworthy of the intelligence of the Senate; and lest I may seem to mean some offense, I will endeavor to explain exactly my meaning.

If the purpose of the Senate is to say that certain funds, and not others, shall be disposed of in a certain way, that should be the declaration. We should not say by the general phraseology of a bill that we mean all and all manner of moneys of this general kind, and then trust to a saving clause at the end to declare that we do not mean to violate treaties. We should not say it for two reasons. In the first place, it is a very unintelligible, and if I may so say, an inartificial mode of declaring the meaning of the law-making power. But it is objectionable for a practical and working reason. It commits to departmental officers, to the subordinate departmental officers who in point of fact attend to transactions of this sort, subject of course to the formal approval of their superiors—it commits to them the power, and the duty perhaps, of deciding which is which, among all these cases. Is that fair? Is it fair, first for the Congress of the United States ex parte to adjudge what shall be in respect of a transaction to which there is another party, and then to delegate by way of discretion to, we know not whom, whoever may be the subordinate officer in a particular instance who passes upon this, the right to say which is a fund to be covered and saved by the saving clause and which is a fund that would fall within the general scope of the bill? It seems to me not. If you are to assume, despite as I conceive of the right of the case, that the United States may properly exert the power, without consulting the Indians, of saying how much shall be paid upon this trust fund, then you should at least say it, and you should say it in some mode or by some rule of certainty, and you should not employ such general terms as commit to somebody else from time to time the power to determine which is a fund falling within one clause of the bill, a contradictory clause as I think, and which is a fund falling within the bill as the bill still remains as far as it does in spite of this contradictory saving clause.

So, then, I should submit to the Senator from Iowa, although I know another member of the committee reported the bill, as he for the present more especially has charge of it, that if the design is to place upon the statutes legislation to the effect ascribed to this by the Senator from West Virginia we should use apt and appropriate words to say that, and not use such ambiguous and as I think somewhat repugnant words as leave an open question, to be determined we do not know when nor with any certainty by whom.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to premise what I have to say in answer to the Senator from New York by the statement that I am not at all responsible for the frame of the bill nor for its general provisions; but I am wholly unable to see how the vice of which the Senator from New York complains as to the fact that the trustee seeks to use the money himself and does not loan it out to other people, but himself undertakes to hold it and to pay interest on it, is cured by paying 5 per cent. interest when there is a vice in paying 4 per cent. or any other rate of interest. And that is a complete answer, I think, to the objection made, so far as the mere question of 4 or 5 per cent. is concerned.

The United States may be a trustee in these cases, perhaps is; but, as has been said by the Senator from Iowa, we all know that whenever an executive officer undertakes to lend out money he can lend it to whom he pleases, unless Congress puts a limitation on him. And if he loans out that fund to the State of Arkansas, to the State of Tennessee, or to any other State, or to a corporation in any State, and the money is lost, we are in good faith bound to make it good. Therefore safety to the Indian, safety to the United States acting as trustee, requires that the money should be held in the Treasury unless some absolute mode can be provided for securing safety otherwise. Congress does not provide any mode by which money can be loaned out with absolute safety to a State, an individual, a corporation, or anybody; and the mere question of what we shall pay comes down to this, what is it worth to us if we are obliged to keep it? We can get all the money we want at 4 per cent., and why should we pay more to these people with whom we have no treaty stipulations—for this only applies to those with whom we have no treaty stipulations—as to the rate and as to whom we are under no obligation except to take care of their interests faithfully, than the money is worth to us? If money is worth to us 6 per cent., we ought to pay that. If it is not worth but 3, we ought not to pay more than 3; but allowing treaty stipulations to hold, admitting that we hold the money as a trust fund, admitting that we cannot authorize an executive officer to loan it out to any State or corporation or individual, so as to secure the interest and principal in all time, occupying the relation of a superior power, dealing alike justly with all citizens, we ought to pay the same interest we pay anybody else. And if it is right in the next Congress to pay 5 or 6 per cent., we ought to pay it, or, if it falls to 3, pay that. We cannot loan it out, and our executive officers cannot be ordered to loan it out, and so, keeping the money, we should pay whatever its use is absolutely worth to the Government of the United States. That is all I say.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to say a word or two in reference to this question. It strikes me that there is no objection to the position of my colleague. The Senator from New York has said that a certain amendment to this bill is in violation of good faith, that such conduct as we propose, as indicated by this amendment, would not be tolerated by a chancellor in a trustee having the charge of funds. It seems to me that that position is not tenable. It strikes me that if a trustee before a court should make a report to the chancellor of his conduct, such as we propose to-day, it would be just, and why? The objection made and the ground assumed by the Senator from New York is that the trustee must do the very best he can for his cestui que trust. That is true; but no court would compel him to do that to the pecuniary injury of the trustee himself. Now, place a private individual just in the position of the United States in this case, for I take it that we are not to loan this money to any private individual or corporation, but that it is to be loaned by the Government to itself or invested in its own bonds. Now, if a private individual was in the same condition, and there should be an objection made to his investment of the fund by anybody, and the chancellor should be told "this trustee has notes out, some at 6, some at 5, and some at 4 per cent., and therefore he should invest it in the fives or sixes," the trustee would answer "that is true, but I am calling in my larger notes; I am calling in those notes of mine bearing 6 per cent. and 5 per cent.; I can get money at a less rate of interest now, and I am calling in the higher notes, and I propose in calling them in and lending this money out, to lend it at the lower rate of interest not to my disadvantage. I propose to do all I can, the best I can for the cestui que trust, but not to my own pecuniary injury; I can get money at 4 per cent., and I am calling in my higher-rate notes for that very purpose; therefore I propose to lend this money at the rate of interest that I can get it at from other parties."

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there for a moment?

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. His answer would be a good one, it seems to me, but for a very broad distinction which he overlooks. He has accidentally before him now a case in which the trustee and the chancellor is the same person, and he assumes in his argument that, because that is true, the right of the other party is varied, and he says the trustee is not bound to do the best he can for his cestui que trust if that so doing injures him, whereas the Senator must perceive that the law and the right takes no note of the fact that the two persons happen to be the same. The United States as trustee in this case ought to do what another trustee should; that is, not to borrow the money itself, nor to decide for itself, but to do that which another trustee would be required to do. What is that? To loan to somebody else; to invest as other people do in the securities the appropriate vehicles of such investment. So the argument which the Senator makes use of, I submit to him, does not arise at all. A trustee has no right to say: "I will borrow this money myself, and, borrowing it, I will not pay any more than I should pay somebody else." The answer is, "You have no business to borrow it; loan it to somebody else and get from that somebody else as much as you can, and then the question does not arise how much you can afford to pay."

Mr. HEREFORD. But that is not the intent. No Senator proposes to lend this money, as I said before, to a private individual, or to an incorporated company. Even the Senator from New York does not propose that. We must take the case just as we find it. As was very properly said by the Senator from New York, in this case we find the chancellor and the trustee the same person, and we must take all the facts as we now find them before us. The Government is the chancellor in this case, and the Government is the trustee in this case, and the trustee proposes to invest this money, not to lend it as I said to private individuals or corporations, but to invest it in the bonds of the chancellor, to invest it in the very best security that is known to our country. That is to say, if the trustee was a private individual it is conceded that his own notes would be the very best investment; but he says, "I am calling in these notes that are bearing a high rate of interest. I cannot afford to pay that high rate of interest any longer. I am calling them in, and I am now about to make a reinvestment of this fund. I do not propose to violate any contract or any treaty with the Indians, but I am proposing now to reinvest this very fund, or to invest a new fund if you please. Then what shall I do?" The trustee, if a private individual, would say, "Shall I bind myself to give a greater rate of interest in this case than I can get money from other parties at? No." No chancellor in the world would hold him to do that. The chancellor would say, I think, just as we are proposing to do now, "Invest the money in new securities, and if it is to be invested in your own notes invest it in your notes bearing the least rate of interest at which you can get money." No harm then is done to the cestui que trust. No harm in that case is done to the trustee. Nobody can complain. Nor has the cestui que trust in this case a right to ask of the trustee to lend out his particular money at a greater rate of interest than he can go into the market and borrow it for.

I am opposed to doing anything that would be bad faith to the Indians; I am in favor of keeping most sacred and inviolate every treaty that we have made with them until it may be changed by a new treaty with them; but in this case, as the conservators, as the protectors of the interests of the whole people of this country, we must deal fairly with the people and with the cestui que trusts, and I think if a report had been made to a chancellor stating these facts and such an objection should be made as is made to-day by the Senator from New York, the chancellor would say, "The trustee has acted in good faith with the cestui que trust; he has made no profit to himself or to any other person; his investment is secure at a rate of interest which is current throughout the land."

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I think there is a weak point in the armor of my distinguished friend from New York. He forgets that the United States Government, if you call it a trustee, is not amenable to any of the rules, and cannot be made amenable to any of the rules which govern ordinary trustees, and for this reason: I will suppose that a half million dollars was invested by the United States Government in certain bonds, either of the State of New York or the State of Connecticut or the State of Tennessee, and five years hence those bonds should turn out to be worthless; the United States Government would still continue to pay the Indians all the interest that was due them upon those bonds, when the United States would not if in the position of an ordinary trustee, for where the statutes of the States provide that the investments may be made in the bonds of the city of New York or the city of Hartford, or of the State of New York or of the State of Connecticut, if then the bonds should turn out to be worthless, the trustee would not be liable. He has done his full duty in the matter. Now this, if I am right, is an answer to the argument which has been made, and I say that the very best investment that possibly can be made to-day is in the 4 per cent. bonds of the United States. The next best investment is in the British consol which yields but 3 per cent.; and if the United States is to go outside of its own limits in order to invest trust funds, let it invest them in English consols rather than in the bonds of some corporation or State, of which I will not now speak. My own conviction is that the United States 4 per cent. bond is the very best investment. It is better than the 5 per cent. of the United States to-day. We are now speaking of a bond to invest in, not assuming that we will pay 5 or 6 or 7 per cent., but if you have to buy a United States bond, in my judgment the 4 per cent. is the best. Shall we take half a million of the money of an Indian tribe and invest it in a 6 per cent. bond that is worth to-day 120 or 125 or 130, and pay the accruing interest to the Indians, or shall we take the 4 per cent. bond of the United States? In calling that the best investment, I believe that I am entirely right. I do not say that 4 is as much as 5, or that 4 is as much as 6, but I say if the bond is to be purchased with the Indians' money the interest payable on that bond at 4 per cent. is the best investment that can be made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am so rarely able to get advantage of the honorable Senator from Connecticut in an argument that when I have one now I want to be sure to claim it.

The honorable Senator said there was a weak spot in my armor. I did not know which one of the many weak spots he was going to refer to.

Mr. EATON. I saw but one.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says in his charity he saw but one. I think I see a weak spot in his argument. It is that an investment in 4 per cent. bonds is the best investment, especially that it is better than an investment in 6 per cent. bonds, because the 6 per cent. bond costs the most. I take issue with the arithmetic of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, and I affirm in the presence of men skilled, as the honorable Senator is, in financial problems, that it makes no difference whatever to an Indian or a white man who owns money whether you invest it at this moment in a 6 per cent. bond or in a 4 per cent bond. Why? Because in the case of the 6 per cent. bond you are compelled to pay a premium, which premium would exactly represent and be compensated by the additional interest but for one fact, which is that the 6 per cent. bond is payable sooner than the 4 per cent. bond, and when it comes to be paid its holder receives only its par value. Taking, then, these two elements of calculation, these two increments of value and loss into the account, the man who takes a given sum of money and invests it in a 6 per cent. bond receives to-day exactly 4 per cent., and the man who invests in a 4 per cent. bond receives exactly 4 per cent. So that it makes no difference either one way or the other in the estimation of a hair, in the minutest fraction, whether you invest one way or invest the other.

Mr. President, I think I am right in that argument. I think the Senator from Connecticut will agree with me on reflection; but if he were right, I submit it would give no support to this bill. If it be true that under the law as it stands the best investment to be made for the Indians is a 4 per cent. United States bond or a 6 per cent. United States bond; then all the authority needed resides now in the custodian of these funds. Therefore you want no legislation.

The honorable Senator made use of one illustration in his argument to which I wish to refer. He said, suppose the investment were in a bond of the State of Connecticut or the State of Tennessee or the State of New York, and those bonds should turn out to be worthless. I object to such a supposition, and I object to it in the case of New York, because not only have her bonds never turned out to be worthless, but when specie payments were suspended and the legal-tender act was passed, the State of New York paid not only interest on her bonds but paid it in gold, and did it by the recommendation of a democratic governor who made the same recommendation as, I think, would have been made by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, knowing him as I do and knowing the strictness with which in his public and private action he always conforms to right. I am glad that he reminded me of this circumstance, because it enables me to object, as I do, to any one suggesting that the bonds of the State of New York could ever be the basis for such a suspicion.

Mr. EATON. My friend thinks he has found a weak point in my argument. Now, I beg to say to him that the best financiers in the country to-day, the people who have in their hands the management of trust funds, to wit, the savings-banks of the country, have been investing immensely within the last three months in 4 per cent. bonds, and they regard them as worth ½ per cent. more than the 6 per cent. bonds. My friend says that all are 4 per cent. bonds. I do not mean to say that he used that language, but I use it for him, because he says that each bond will be reduced to the same value practically on account of the effect of the shortness of the time the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds have to run. As a matter of ordinary financial calculation he is unquestionably right, but as a matter of business transaction he is wrong, because men do not go into this minute figuring with regard to where the point would be where the 4 and the 5 and the 6 percents agreed; and therefore it is that I say that the best financiers that I know of in New England are to-day taking the 4 per cent. bonds as the best investment for the savings of the poor.

Mr. CONKLING. Only because they can get no other safe investment.

Mr. EATON. No matter what the cause, it comes back to my assertion that the best interest the Indian can have to-day is the 4 per cent. bond, because it has the longest term to run.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he thinks he can satisfy the Indian that it is the best security for him to have when the treaty obligation with him is that he shall have 5 per cent. or 6 per cent.?

Mr. EATON. My friend would not misrepresent me?

Mr. PADDOCK. No, sir.

Mr. EATON. I have not asserted that any agreement, any stipulation, any contract that the United States has entered into with any branch of these people should be violated. Very far from it. If we have agreed to pay them 10 per cent., let us pay it. If we have agreed to pay a dollar to the bondholder who has given but forty-seven cents on the dollar for his bond, let us pay him one hundred cents on the dollar, because we have agreed to do it.

Mr. BECK. We have already amended the bill to do that.

Mr. EATON. But the Indian is our ward. Let us do justice by him. Let us give him all that belongs to him and no more, and the best investment he can have is the 4 per cent. bond of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WITHERS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. PADDOCK. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. WINDOM. There seems to be but little probability of finishing this bill this afternoon.

Mr. ALLISON. It can be finished in five minutes.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senate would like to act on the naval appropriation bill. Unless the pending bill can be voted upon at once, I shall ask the Senate to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. We can vote on this in a few minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this debate is to go on, I shall insist that it proceed under the rule, and that each Senator shall speak but "once, and for five minutes only."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the debate is proceeding by unanimous consent. It is within the power of a Senator at any time to stop the debate by asking that the rule be enforced.

Mr. WINDOM. If this bill is to be debated further, I shall ask to lay it aside and take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to say about five words on the pending question?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The pending question is whether 4 per cent. should be inserted in lieu of 5 per cent., I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] proposing to insert "4 per cent." instead of "5 per cent."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have a word to say upon that question before the subject passes from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. After hearing all that has been said upon this subject, desiring to do justice as fully as I can with reference to these trust funds, and seeing the current of sentiment rather favoring a lower rate of interest than 5 per cent. in cases where there are no treaty stipulations, I believe if the Senator from Kentucky will compromise with me I will compromise with him, and propose 4½ per cent. as the rate of interest.

Mr. BECK. I will withdraw my amendment if that is done, because that is about the average rate.

Mr. ALLISON. We should then pay at the rate of 4½ per cent. upon such funds as are now in the custody of the United States having no specific rate provided for by treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kentucky to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BECK. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn, and the Senator from Iowa moves to amend the bill by substituting "4½ per cent." for "5 per cent."

Mr. ALLISON. If that is generally accepted, I want to perfect the bill in accordance with it, because I wish to say that it will be found that in nearly every instance we have provided for 5 per cent. by treaty.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if the general understanding of the Indians in respect of the funds, where there is no stipulation, is not that in the absence of a stipulation there shall be paid so much as 5 per cent. interest? If we pay less, will it not lead to a misunderstanding? Will it not convey the impression to the Indians in such cases that there is a disposition on the part of the Government to take from them that to which they are entitled under regulations heretofore established? There is the danger in all this business. It is not important to haggle about a half per cent. interest here to be paid to the Indians. The question is whether you are to satisfy them, whether you are to keep them quiet, or whether you are to give to them an incentive to outbreak and the destruction of life and property.

Mr. ALLISON. There are but very few treaties where the rate of interest is not prescribed, and in such cases if the fund is placed in the Treasury of the United States and 4½ per cent. paid regularly, which is ½ per cent. higher than the United States is generally compelled to pay, I think that we do reasonable justice to the Indians.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee which reported this bill whether his understanding of it is that it is a mere present regulation in so far as it applies to funds which are not at present the subject of treaty stipulation, or whether it is a perpetual promise by the United States? That is a question which will arise hereafter; and it seems to me very desirable that in our dealing with such matters we should not leave for the future debatable questions as to whether the country is bound in honor. Ought not this provision that the United States shall pay interest, &c., to be made either to signify an absolute promise in regard to all these funds now put into the Treasury, if that is what the Indians are to have, or simply a statute regulation, if that is all we are going to enact?

Mr. ALLISON. I will say in response to the Senator from Massachusetts that when this bill was originally reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs it was intended as a present regulation. The Secretary of the Interior found the Department in this condition: he found a treaty requiring the investment of funds bearing 5 per cent. interest, and he also found that in order to make such an investment it was necessary to pay a premium on the bonds purchased. The Secretary of the Interior believed that it was hardly within the spirit of these treaties to be compelled to pay a premium of 9 or 10 per cent., as these bonds were then bearing a premium of 9 or 10 per cent., in order to comply with a stipulation which required a semi-annual interest at the rate of 5 per cent. a year. Therefore he asked the Congress of the United States to permit him, instead of going into the market and buying 5 per cent. bonds at a premium, to put that money in the Treasury and allow it to be used as other moneys are used in the Treasury, and pay the Indians what we had agreed to pay them, namely, 5 per cent. semi-annually. It turns out in an examination of the treaties that there are some treaties which provide no specific rate, and Senators say that 5 per cent. is too high a rate to pay upon funds where no specific rate is prescribed in the treaty. Therefore a proposition has been made to pay 4 per cent. It seems to me that if we pay 4½ per cent. in such cases we fairly comply for the present with our treaty obligations.

There is great force in what the Senator from Massachusetts says, that if we put this now in the form of a statute without some notice to the Indian tribes that it is temporary and may be changed hereafter, it will be regarded in the nature of an obligation binding upon the Government for all time. Therefore it seems to me that it ought to be stated, that this is not intended as a permanent provision; that it is intended as a provision of law regulating the investment of funds by the Secretary of the Interior, rather than a stipulation which shall be binding in all future time between the United States and the Indian tribes with whom the United States may be dealing. The object of this bill is merely to regulate funds which are now in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior, and it is not intended to be permanent.

Mr. HOAR. If the bill goes over, I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he put in some words when it comes up again making that clear. If he does not mean to say that the United States engage to pay by this language, then let him express a reserved right to change the provision in regard to these funds where the Indians have no existing obligation.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he regards the language as now employed to be a binding obligation, or as fairly construable to be a binding obligation, on the part of the Government to pay for all time the rate of interest fixed by the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I regard it as extremely ambiguous. As it is now, it strikes me that the language is ambiguous, and it might well be claimed that it made a perpetual engagement of the public faith.

Mr. BLAINE. To pay 5 per cent.?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, if that is to be the rate of interest.

Mr. BLAINE. The question may have been answered before, as I have not attended to the debate as I ought to have done, but was not the provision to pay 5 per cent. put in at a time when the Government was paying that as its lowest rate? Was it not the underlying suggestion of the original enactment, that the interest should be fixed at the lowest rate the Government was then paying?

Mr. ALLISON. That was one underlying suggestion.

Mr. BLAINE. Was it not the main one? Was it not legislating in perfect good faith to give that fund the benefit of the lowest rate of interest the Government was paying, and so if we establish now the rate the Government is paying?

Mr. ALLISON. Five per cent?

Mr. BLAINE. Four per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh, no. The object of the bill is to enable these Indian tribes to receive 5 per cent., the treaty stipulation rate, without the Government being compelled to pay a premium for it. That was the object of the legislation originally. Now it turns out that some of the treaties do not fix a rate, and therefore it is thought best to provide for those tribes, and so a rate of 4 per cent. has been suggested.

Mr. BLAINE. I think that is enough. That is what any wise guardian would do for his ward to-day.

Mr. ALLISON. Invest the fund in 4 per cent. bonds?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; if you want something that can be found when you go after it; if you want something you do not have to watch for.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be that that is fair, but we are paying now 5 per cent. upon every obligation we are under to the Indians.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the United States is simply giving 1 per cent. gratuity, for the simple reason that any money the United States owes to-day it is able to pay in cash by selling its 4 per cent. bonds at par, and therefore whatever it gives beyond that is a gratuity, not an obligation.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a fair question for every Senator to settle according to his own conscience and judgment of what is right and proper. The stipulation was made in some of these treaties when 5 per cent. was the lowest rate at which the Government could obtain money.

Mr. BLAINE. That was the lowest rate at that time the United States was able to obtain money for. Some of the stipulations were made when we had to pay as high as 7.3 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. Some of the treaties were made when we could have borrowed money at 3½ per cent. where we stipulated to pay 5 per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know when that period was. On long time?

Mr. ALLISON. I think so.

Mr. BLAINE. When was that interesting period in our history?

Mr. ALLISON. I only know that we paid a large premium for 4 per cent. bonds in order to pay off our debts at one time in our history.

Mr. BLAINE. When?

Mr. ALLISON. In 1828–'29–'30, or 1831–'32—along there.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think there ever was a 4 per cent. bond of the United States issued and capitalized in that way.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps those were bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest.

Mr. BLAINE. Or 5 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. We paid 30 per cent. premium for some of them at that time, so that we could obtain money for 3½ per cent. I am perfectly certain that we can borrow money to-day at 3½ per cent. by making the time longer. A great many considerations enter into what we ought to do when we are dealing with the Indian tribes in such a matter as this.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the large premium to which the Senator refers was that paid on the Mexican war loan under the administration of Mr. Guthrie in the Treasury Department. The war loan of 1812, I think, was never negotiated below 6 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. I am not speaking of the negotiation of a loan, but I am speaking of outstanding bonds.

Mr. BLAINE. That rate never was paid in borrowing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In addition to what the Senator from Maine has so well said as to the rate of interest paid when these treaties were made, I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that 5 per cent. was the lowest the Government had ever paid most probably up to that time; and certainly it was lower than the average of the Government loans at the time these treaties were made. But in addition to that, the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Kentucky have both said that 4 per cent. is a fair rate. I think so. Why? I think it is a better investment at that rate in Government bonds to-day than any business investment at 6 per cent.; and that is proven. Every day from one to ten millions or from one to twenty millions (I believe it has been as high as $20,000,000 in some cases) of United States bonds are being taken at 4 per cent., and why? They are exempt from taxation; and that exemption makes them equivalent to more than 6 per cent. ordinarily. In the city of New York probably such an investment at 3 per cent. would be equivalent to 6 per cent.; and so to-day an investment at 4 per cent. in Government bonds in New York and other places is better than an ordinary business operation at 7 per cent. or 6 per cent.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Would the exemption from taxation affect these Indian funds at all, beneficially or otherwise?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Would the Indians receive any benefit from that?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly. If the Indian fund was invested in any other stocks; if it was invested in bank stocks, or if the Senator should borrow it, or if it were invested in any other way, it would most surely have to pay taxes. Who would have to pay them? They would have to come out of the income. Certainly it would affect the Indian investment. Although my friend on the left [Mr. BECK] has accepted 4½ per cent., I believe now that 4 per cent. would be the proper rate, because we are to look to the time, as the Senator from Iowa has just said, when the rate at which the United States can borrow money will be 3½ per cent. or perhaps 3, and it will be a more permanent investment and be better for all concerned from the fact, as the Senator from Maine has so well said, that at the time the treaties we are now acting under were made the rate fixed was lower than the Government borrowed money for. The Government paid 6 per cent. on an average then; and for that reason the precedent was set at that time that we should pay the lowest rate of interest that the Government was paying, and being exempt from taxation it was a proper and a fair rate of interest. So the people of the country every day are subscribing largely to the Government loan at 4 per cent., and doing that in preference to investing the money in securities at home.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if the Senator from West Virginia has before him a treaty justifying his argument, there is no doubt about his conclusion. If he has a treaty binding the United States to pay the Indians at least the lowest rate of interest from time to time, then he has the premise on which he argues.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from New York, I know, will allow me a word.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I said that when treaties cited here to-day were made the rate fixed by them was lower than the average rate of the Government loan. I made no statement such as the Senator now has made.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall not deal with that assertion, because I think it has nothing in the world to do with the question before us. If I have made a contract with the honorable Senator from West Virginia to pay him 5 per cent. interest, the reasons which moved me to make that contract have nothing to do with the question, when the question is whether I am to fulfill it or no. The reason may be that I thought it a better contract than I could make with somebody else. The reason may be that I had such a regard for the honorable Senator from West Virginia that I preferred to make the contract with him, even upon terms not quite so good, than to make it with some less reliable man. But all that has nothing in the world, I repeat, to do with my obligation, when he comes to call upon me for a fulfillment of that contract.

The case before us is that of having made a contract, a solemn contract, known as a treaty, by which contract we agreed to do a certain thing. What was it? To pay from time to time in the future at least the lowest rate of interest then ruling? Not at all. It was to pay so many dollars and so many cents, and to pay it absolutely, not conditioned upon the ups or downs of future advantage. What door is open then to go back and consider why we did this, and whether we might have done something else, and whether at some other time we would have done that. Mr. President, it is the first step that costs. Open the door for that argument, and you can prove a case for repudiation whenever interest or motive demands repudiation.

I heard the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] saying something a few moments ago of this being a contract with a weak and defenseless party on the other side. I was glad to hear him say it, glad to have the Senate reminded that we ought not to take advantage of the power, of the impunity, growing out of the fact that instead of dealing with one of the great treaty-making powers of the globe we are dealing with the remnants of broken and scattered Indian tribes. I say that so far from lowering the standard and resorting to arguments of profit and loss to evade an agreement, we ought to see to it that even more certainly, even more conscientiously than in another case, we shall fall short in nothing of the honest requirement of our obligation. We agreed to pay 5 per cent. The Senator from West Virginia says that was a low interest at that time. Grant it; and, if he should say it was a high interest at that time, grant it.

My purpose was to try to attract the attention of the Senate to the fact, if it be a fact, that the point in judgment here is not what we would like to do now, not what we wish had been done at another time, not what the reasons were which made past action wise or otherwise——

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator from New York for information, whether there was an express rate of interest stipulated for in the treaty?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does not the Senator know——

Mr. CONKLING. Not in some of them, if the Senator from West Virginia will pardon me one moment, and I hear a Senator say "not in some of them," in all of them not. I am talking of those treaties, of which there are a number which, in so many words, guarantee 5 per cent. interest.

Mr. MERRIMON. It seems to me, then, we are bound to pay it.

Mr. BLAINE. Nobody differs on that question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator from New York allow me to remark that he misunderstood me to say that I would disturb the treaties now in existence? Whatever I said referred to moneys to be put in the Treasury hereafter or that may be there uninvested now, not to the treaties which stipulate a fixed rate of interest; because, as the Senator understands, the Senator from Vermont has already offered an amendment which provides expressly that the bill shall not affect the present treaties.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator tell me, then, why it was that he so urgently referred to the fact, and repeated it, that when 5 per cent. was fixed as the amount it was lower than the rate of interest which then prevailed?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly I will.

Mr. CONKLING. And that therefore we might proceed to make it the lowest rate now?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, yes, I will tell the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. Why was it?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The object was to show that at that time the law-making power selected the lowest rate of interest that was then in existence to base these treaties upon; and therefore the conclusion would be with us, now that we are doing the same thing in making a new treaty, that we should follow the precedent that was then established.

Mr. CONKLING. That was the argument then, Mr. President; that because in past times in making treaties they fixed the lowest rate of interest, therefore, if we were going to make a treaty now, it would be wise to do that. I agree to that. I did not know there was any such question before the Senate. I did not know that we were making Indian treaties here now. On the contrary I thought that we were acting upon a bill which proposed to deal with Indian treaties already made, and only with such Indian treaties. If there is really the projét of a new Indian treaty before us, then I have been slumbering so much that I did not understand that. Surely in common with other Senators I understood the argument to be that because originally when the rate of interest was fixed that rate was the lowest, or below the lowest current rate of interest, ergo it would be a performance of the spirit of that contract if we now paid the rate of interest at the lowest current at present. If that was not the argument, then I greatly misapprehended it; and I find that I am not alone in the misapprehension under which I was laboring. When the Senator returns to the suggestion he made once before, that the bill is to operate only upon moneys which shall in the future come into our hands, subject to engagements which do not exist now, then I have only to say, as I said before, that the bill for such a purpose and with such an interpretation, instead of being what it should be, is, it seems to me, a very roundabout, a very evasive, and a very unintelligible way of expressing such a meaning.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to lay aside the present and all prior orders and to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will allow me a word before he does that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WINDOM. For a moment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from New York certainly shot very wide of the mark when he said that I alluded to treaties already made. Many Senators sitting around me who listened to me did not think I said any such thing. The Senator from New York was far from the mark when he supposed that I had any allusion whatever to treaties already in existence, and his misapprehension may be accounted for from the fact that I think the Senator from New York is usually engaged at something else when a Senator is speaking. Therefore I am not surprised that he did not catch just exactly what I meant. I may have put it unintelligibly to the Senate, but certainly the Senator could not have listened to me or he would not have made his argument if he had, for it is on a different line from what I said altogether.

The Senator from New York said something about repudiation. I do not see what this question has to do with repudiation. I am unable to see what it has to do with it in the most remote degree. Nobody has intimated such a thing here as that we intended to get rid of an agreement, but on the contrary it has been said that all agreements ought to be carried out faithfully. The bill relates to moneys now in the Treasury that must find an investment or moneys that hereafter must find an investment.

The Senator from New York spoke of my referring to an Indian treaty now before us. The Senator knew that I know better than that, and that there is no Indian treaty before us at this moment. Every Senator in the Senate knew that there was no such treaty before us.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator did not understand me to impute to him a belief that there was an Indian treaty before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator said as much as though I believed it.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no; the Senator from West Virginia is quite wrong.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What did the Senator say?

Mr. CONKLING. He is almost as wrong as he thinks I am. I said if we had an Indian treaty, or the projet I believe was my expression, of an Indian treaty before us now, then I could understand the force of the argument, but as we had not I could not understand it. That is what I said.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Well, that is just about the same thing, and the Senator has not got a great way from saying it now; he reasserts merely what he said before. However, it is hardly worth while to pursue the matter further. But I repeat that I believe 4 per cent. is a proper rate of interest, and I believe it is more than equivalent to 6 per cent. interest in ordinary business transactions; that is, the Government interest of 4 per cent. is better than ordinary business transactions at 6 or at 7 per cent., which is the legal interest, I believe, in New York; and to-day the people of New York are investing largely in Government bonds at 4 per cent. instead of loaning their money at home on the very best security at 7 per cent. That is the argument I attempted to advance, and if the Senator from New York had been listening to me he would have seen what I meant, and he would have known whether or not I said what he imputes to me.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota insist on his motion?

Mr. WINDOM. I now submit my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the present bill be discontinued, for the purpose of taking up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not object to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, but I give notice that when the Calendar is taken up again under the rule I shall ask the Chair to enforce the rule. The bill has not been discussed under the rule at all to-day. The rule requires that "each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only." Many of the Senators have spoken ten or fifteen minutes at a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule provides for further discussion by unanimous consent, and the Chair considered that the debate was so progressing, and consequently he did not call attention to the rule. It is in the power of a Senator at any time to have the rule enforced by calling attention to it and asking that it be enforced.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall interpose objection to such a debate at another time.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire if the motion of the Senator from Minnesota is necessary, and if the order does not terminate after the expiration of half an hour on the objection of any Senator under the rule itself?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the construction of the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not necessary, I submit, for the Senator from Minnesota to make his motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has made it, and it is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I know, but of course the bill will come up regularly to-morrow when the Calendar is reached again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will come up on the call of the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know anything about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay aside the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. That lays aside the patent bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Informally, as I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it does not lay aside anything informally. It postpones all prior orders.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Is that the object of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HOAR. Of course that is the effect of it.

Mr. WINDOM. My object is simply to get up the naval appropriation bill. I do not desire to postpone the Senator's patent bill at all except for that one purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would rule that the effect of the motion is to postpone that bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, but the Senator from New Hampshire can move to take it up to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Chair to sustain what I intended as a point of order on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustained the point of order that one objection would cause the consideration of the Indian trust fund bill to go over; but that fact, in the opinion of the Chair, does not make the motion of the Senator from Minnesota out of order.

Mr. HOAR. My point was that the rule adopted on motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] directs the Senate to proceed with that order of business for the half hour after one o'clock, and after that time that order of business terminates on the objection of any Senator, and a motion to lay it aside is not in order. That is my point.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the patent bill goes over.

Mr. HOAR. That would be laid aside informally. My point is that the motion of the Senator from Minnesota is not necessary.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no choice, so that the naval appropriation bill be taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate has voted, and the motion has been agreed to. The naval appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the Chair to sustain my point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, the Chair only said it was a good point, but that the Senator from Minnesota had a right to make the motion. Let us hear the bill read, Mr. President.

Mr. WINDOM. In the discussion on the patent bill yesterday I said that I would not attempt to postpone it to-day, and as it seems to be the understanding that the motion which I made for another purpose has that effect, if I may have the consent of the Senate, I ask that the vote on my motion be reconsidered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate can take up the patent bill to-morrow. Let us hear the naval bill read.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and I will then ask consent of the Senate to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to be to reconsider the vote by which the naval appropriation bill was taken up?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, because I feel in good faith bound to do that on the statement I made yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the reconsideration of the motion by which the naval appropriation bill was taken up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I should like to hear the naval bill read, to see whether we ought to reconsider the vote, if the Senate wants to pass it.

Mr. HOAR. I trust the Senator from Vermont will not insist on holding the Senate to that vote. The motion was put under a total misapprehension. I understood that the Chair sustained my point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was not put under a total misapprehension, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I hope my friend, the Senator from Vermont, will not insist upon the Senate doing what the Senator from Minnesota says would be a breach of good faith on his part.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, I will not insist on anything; I am too yielding for that. I am willing to reconsider every vote that the Senate has taken this session, so far as I can remember.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont insist on the reading of the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. CONKLING. May I make an inquiry? Is not a motion in order now to reconsider the vote by which the patent bill was postponed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion has been made to reconsider the vote by which the naval appropriation bill was taken up. The Chair considers the proper motion to be to reconsider the vote by which the further consideration of the patent bill was laid aside and the naval appropriation bill taken up.

Mr. CONKLING. Now the Senator from New Hampshire can make the motion to reconsider because there was no division on the vote; anybody can make it; and I feel bound for one to say that although I do not know that I had an active part in this postponement, the Senator from New Hampshire had a right to suppose that to-day without anybody's objection he would be allowed to go on with the patent bill; and therefore, unless there be something about this that I do not understand, it seems to me we ought to reconsider this motion by general consent and let him proceed with the patent bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands such to be the purpose of the Senator from Minnesota in making his motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. I submitted the motion to reconsider, not to proceed with the patent bill, but to let it go over informally, because I feared it might be construed as not quite coming up to the understanding yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to a reconsideration of the vote, and that will put the patent bill back where it was.

Mr. WINDOM. If the motion to reconsider is carried I shall ask that the present and all prior orders be laid aside informally for the purpose of taking up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us know now what is the pending question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the naval appropriation bill was taken up; and that vote having been reconsidered, the question will be whether the Senate will take up that bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the business before the Senate preceding this present order? What is the prior order before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The continuing order of the Senate, as the Chair understands, is the consideration of the patent bill. The bill proposing to invest the Indian trust funds was taken up after the morning hour by virtue of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island. That bill was liable to go over at any time after the half hour should have expired, upon an objection, leaving as the business before the Senate the patent bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if I understand the Chair, the patent bill being before the Senate, the motion of the Senator from Minnesota is to lay that order aside informally to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. WINDOM. That is the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to take up the naval appropriation bill.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 613) subjecting the Fort Wayne military reservation in the State of Arkansas to entry as other public lands in said State.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 1297) for the protection of dairymen and to prevent deception in sales of butter and cheese in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. No. 1374) authorizing the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution to appoint an acting secretary in certain cases.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 5501) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1880; and

A bill (S. No. 109) defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives.

PETITION.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present the petition of Alexander R. Shepherd, praying an appropriation for the payment of the rent of premises known as No. 915 E street northwest, in the city of Washington, used and occupied by the Government for the use of the Post-Office Department. As it is brief I ask that it be printed, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, do not print it. We cannot print petitions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope there will be no objection to printing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WITHERS.) Is there objection to having the petition printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object; not because I object to this particular petition, but it is very expensive to be printing petitions, and I object, every time my attention is called to it, to printing petitions of that character.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I now move to lay aside the pending and all prior orders informally for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. As I intend to ask the Senate to act on the few amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations as the bill is being read, I will state briefly what those amendments are.

The total of the bill as it passed the House is $14,018,468.95. The total of the estimates for 1880 was $14,187,381.45. The total of the act for 1879 was $14,152,603.70. The amount added to the House bill by the Senate committee is $86,500, making the total of the bill as reported $14,104,968.95. As reported, the bill is less than the estimates by $82,412.50; and as reported, it is less than the act for 1879 by $47,634.75. The items of increase proposed by the Senate committee are as follows:

For purchase of postage-stamps, $5,000.

For clothing and bedding destroyed, $1,200.

For gratuities and medals, $500.

For repairs to dome of telescope, $300.

For changes in controlling clocks and time signals, $500.

For provisions and clothing, water for ships, &c., $75,000.

For purchase of testing machine and contingencies, $4,000.

Making a total of $86,500 proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. I ask that the amendments of the committee be acted upon in their order as the bill is read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read, and the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted upon in their order as they are reached.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 87, to insert:

For the purchase of ordinary postage-stamps for use on official matter, to be sent to foreign countries in pursuance of the requirements of the united postal union, $5,000; to be available on and after April 1, 1879.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 92, to insert:

To pay for clothing and bedding of officers and others in the Navy and Marine Corps, destroyed to prevent the spread of disease, $1,200; to be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 96, to insert:

For gratuities and medals of honor, under section 1407 of the Revised Statutes, $500; to be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 171, in the appropriations for the Bureau of Navigation, to insert:

For repairs to dome of twenty-six-inch telescope, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 173, to insert:

For changing the method of controlling clocks and time-signals, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, in line 310, after the words "one million," to strike out "and twenty-five" and insert "one hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For provisions for the seamen and marines; commuted rations for officers, seamen, and marines; expenses of inspectors and storehouses; and for purchase of water for ships, $1,100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, after line 355, to insert:

For the purchase of one testing machine for making tests of plate-iron, &c., $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 357, to insert:

For contingencies, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I merely desire to make a change, if the Senate will concur in the suggestion I am about to make, in regard to one or two trivial matters as far as the Government is concerned, but of some importance to individuals. At the Naval Academy the gas-fitter has been reduced from $3.50 to $2.50 a day, which is much lower than a gas-fitter and plumber receives from private employers, and I really think that it is an unjust discrimination against that sort of mechanic who requires a good deal of skill in the performance of his duty. I therefore move to strike out "two," in line 407, page 18, and insert "three." It will not change the general appropriation, because it is calculated on all the days of the year, and probably it will not be absorbed even with this amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not quite understand the amendment of the Senator, because I could not hear him distinctly. If it increases the amount, I raise the point of order that there has been no notice.

Mr. WHYTE. It is not likely that it will increase the amount of appropriation at all, because the appropriation is made upon the basis of all the days in the year, and they are not paid except for the days they work. Consequently this $1 per day will not increase the whole amount of the appropriation, I am satisfied, and I hope, therefore, my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, will not object.

Mr. WINDOM. It seems to raise the pay from two dollars and a half to three dollars and a half a day. I feel at liberty to make this point of order, because I believe we have appropriated fully up to the estimates, and ought not to exceed them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order being raised, the Chair sustains it.

Mr. WHYTE. Suppose I divide the difference and get the point withdrawn. Say $3 instead of $2.50. It is a very unjust discrimination against this man. Personal application was made to me by several gentlemen residing in Annapolis, and I made inquiry and found that no good mechanic can be employed by private people as a plumber and gas-fitter combined, doing both kinds of work, for any such price as $2.50 a day. Three dollars and a half is the usual price. It is certainly the price paid in Baltimore for an ordinary mechanic.

Mr. WINDOM. Another reason why I feel at liberty to insist on the point of order is that last year the Senate tried to increase this but failed to accomplish it, and the sum appropriated is fully up to the estimate of this year, and nobody has complained until the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. I have three or four letters from prominent people of Annapolis——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rule is against you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order being raised, the Chair is bound to decide the amendment out of order.

Mr. WHYTE. There were one or two other amendments that I proposed to offer of a trivial character, but the inexorable manner of the two Senators over there is such that I shall abandon any attempt to rectify these defects.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The appropriations people are very rigorous.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment:

In line 158, strike out all after the word "astronomers" down to and including the word "dollars," in line 160, and insert in lieu thereof:

One at $1,500 during first three years of service; one at $1,700 during second three years of service; and one at $2,100 after nine years service; in all, $5,300.

That has the authority of the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Rodgers.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to ask whether that increases the appropriation, because I do not think a plumber ought to be rejected and an astronomer put over his head. I am for the plumbers against the astronomers if there is going to be any discrimination.

Mr. ALLISON. In other words, you object now to the astronomers because you cannot get the plumber?

Mr. WHYTE. Precisely. I am perfectly willing to take care of the astronomers if the plumber be taken care of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland raise the point of order?

Mr. WHYTE. I do. I am for equality all around.

Mr. ALLISON. I am willing to take care of the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order being raised, the Chair decides the amendment out of order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] desires to address the Senate briefly upon this bill, but does not wish to go on this afternoon at this late hour of the day; I therefore ask that the bill be laid over, and it can be acted on to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAINE. At half past one to-morrow, if it will be agreeable to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I propose to be heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot fix certainly the time; but it will be when the bill is up.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand that the Senator will object to its coming up to-morrow?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot say that certainly. There may be something else to-morrow that may require immediate attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Minnesota to move that the bill be passed over.

Mr. ALLISON. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAINE. The pending business, the unfinished business, then, will be the naval appropriation bill, which comes up after the morning hour, at half past one to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. That is it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the doors are closed, I desire to give notice that I wish to have two amendments to the naval bill printed. I submit the amendments now and ask that they be printed. They need not be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and printed.

Mr. BECK. Will they be subject to any points of order afterward.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly. They are not offered yet. It is merely a notice given that I shall offer them.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 21, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to make a correction of the Journal. The bill numbered 2240 was set for consideration after the morning hour. I made that suggestion and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It was so ordered, and the Journal will be corrected accordingly. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I yield for a moment to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. ATKINS. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior in regard to the reconstruction or completion of the Interior Department building was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. ATKINS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5738) to appropriate money for the improvement of the Missouri River between Yankton and Sioux City, in the Territory of Dakota; and the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask general consent of the House to report from the Committee on the Library the bill (S. No. 1374) to authorize the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution to appoint an acting secretary to sign vouchers.

There was no objection, and the bill (S. No. 1374) authorizing the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution to appoint an acting secretary in certain cases was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOLOID METRIC COINAGE.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, submitted a report from that committee in relation to the metrical goloid coinage; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

COINAGE OF THE GOLOID METRIC DOLLAR, ETC.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, submitted a bill (H. R. No. 6125) to authorize the coinage of the goloid metric dollar, five dollars, and fractions of a dollar, and of metric gold coin of standard value; which was recommitted to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL MONUMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Rules, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution in relation to a centennial monument and that it be referred to a select committee.

The SPEAKER. That subject is already before a select committee of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. But this subject was referred to the Committee on Rules, and I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject and that it be referred to a select committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is quite distinct in his recollection that this subject is before a committee of thirteen.

Mr. STEELE. I beg leave to say that the subject of this resolution is now in the hands of a committee of this House, of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PATTERSON] is chairman, and that that committee has agreed upon an adverse report.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Then I move that the resolution be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

FORT WAYNE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. GAUSE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 613) subjecting Fort Wayne military reservation, in the State of Arkansas, to entry as other public lands in said State, with the Senate amendment thereto.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and hereby is, authorized to issue the instructions necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

Mr. GAUSE. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GAUSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIPHER DISPATCHES.

Mr. POTTER. I asked the House on yesterday to give permission for the consideration this morning of a resolution which I was instructed to introduce by the committee of investigation of electoral frauds. I then stated that I desired but an hour for the discussion of that resolution. I notice that the Journal has entered no restriction upon the discussion. Various gentlemen have called my attention to that fact, and insisted upon it that I should not allow the discussion to be protracted beyond the hour. The only way in which I can carry out what they consider to have been the understanding of the House is to move the previous question on the resolution, which will leave an hour for debate.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

Mr. POTTER. Before that is done I desire to make a verbal correction in the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Before there is any discussion on the subject, I wish to make the point of order that the resolution must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the resolution was made a special order immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. CONGER. For consideration subject to the rules of the House, of course.

The SPEAKER. A special order, where the understanding is by unanimous consent that a matter shall be considered in the House, waives all rules that would prevent its consideration in the House. Besides, the resolution does not appropriate money, but directs its payment out of the contingent fund of the House, already or to be hereafter appropriated.

Mr. CONGER. I thought we might facilitate the passage of the resolution by considering it in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, which would give many members an opportunity to speak.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it would facilitate the passage of the resolution to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union——

Mr. CONGER. Then I desire to have it passed as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. Because in the Committee of the Whole there is no previous question.

Mr. POTTER. The resolution provides that the money shall be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms under the direction of the chairman of the committee; "and that he make report to the House of the manner in which the same has been expended." It has been suggested that "he" may not necessarily refer to the Sergeant-at-Arms. I therefore desire to substitute the words "the Sergeant-at-Arms" for the word "he;" so that it will read "and that the Sergeant-at-Arms make report to the House," &c.

The SPEAKER. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas certain alleged telegrams in cipher have been published, indicating that attempts were made after the presidential election of 1876 to influence by money or other fraudulent methods the vote of electors or the action of canvassing boards in the States of Florida, South Carolina, and Oregon; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the committee upon the investigation of the electoral frauds, &c., be directed to inquire into the same (and into any other matter connected with the said election which in their judgment may be proper) and that they have power to send for persons and papers and to sit during the sessions of the House, with leave to report at any time. And that there be paid by the Clerk of the House to the Sergeant-at-Arms out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $10,000 for the purposes of the committee, to be expended under the direction of the chairman of the committee or of any subcommittee; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms make report to the House of the manner in which the same has been expended, which report, when examined and approved by the Committee of Accounts, shall be deemed a satisfactory accountability on his part of the same; and that any unexpended balance remaining in his hands be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] whether he wishes to claim his hour after the main question shall have been ordered?

Mr. POTTER. I do; and I now call the previous question, because that is the only way in which I can limit debate on the resolution in accordance with the understanding of yesterday.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. May I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to allow an amendment to be offered to his resolution before he calls the previous question upon it?

Mr. POTTER. I will answer the gentleman when I have heard it read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And further, to inquire whether any cipher or other telegrams, relating to the electoral votes of the States of South Carolina, Oregon, Florida, and Louisiana, have been destroyed, suppressed, or concealed by any person; and, if so, under whose authority or instructions the same was done; and to ascertain from whom said dispatches were forwarded, and to whom sent.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] yield to that amendment?

Mr. POTTER. I do not; because the resolution as reported from the committee includes all that subject-matter. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. POTTER. The resolution which I have sent to the Clerk's desk I offered because I was instructed to offer it by the special committee of investigation. I do not desire to discuss it, nor to say anything except a few words in reply to an attack which was made upon me some days since by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] I was not in the House at the time, and when the gentleman's attention was called to that fact he stated that I had left the House to avoid hearing him. If the gentleman really thought so he was mistaken.

I think I listen to the sprightly and amiable utterances of the gentleman from Michigan with as much satisfaction as most gentlemen in this House. But it is not possible for a member to be always in his seat, and the gentleman ought not to infer from my absence that I have any unwillingness to hear him. Had he informed me that he proposed to refer to the cipher dispatches, I should certainly, at whatever inconvenience to myself, have remained and heard him, because I could then have better said in respect of this matter what I have now to say.

I had listened to that gentleman several times during that day when he spoke on the post-office appropriation bill, and it was impossible for me to divine that when next he rose he intended to discuss the subject he did.

The gentleman arraigned me because I had not permitted an investigation of these cipher dispatches. Mr. Speaker, it was as open to the gentleman from Michigan, ever since this session of Congress began, and to every other member of the House as to myself, to propose such an investigation. He did not propose it; no gentleman on that side of the House proposed it, for reasons that are perhaps not difficult to divine, and which at any rate were satisfactory to themselves.

No gentleman on this side of the House had then proposed such an inquiry, and the gentleman from Michigan said that I had not permitted any one on this side to do so. Mr. Speaker, for this statement there was no foundation. I neither had power to prevent, nor had I sought to prevent, any democrat from doing so. The only wish upon the subject that I had expressed was that if such a resolution should be introduced it might be referred to another committee than that of which I was a member. But I neither sought to influence any one nor to prevent any one from acting in respect of the matter. I simply refused to volunteer to introduce such a resolution myself, and for reasons which I am about to state.

During the last Congress I submitted a resolution for the appointment of a committee to inquire into certain alleged and confessed wrongs in Florida and Louisiana which had taken place under the color of State law, and by which the result of the presidential election had been reversed and which had been perpetrated under the influence of Federal visitors and with the protection of Federal troops; and which the electoral commission had decided it was impossible for the States to recall. Such a matter was a proper subject for congressional action; for although Congress could not try nor punish wrongs that had been committed against State laws, it could at least adopt such legislation as would afford the States some opportunity to recall a vote or an act which had been falsely certified to Congress as the act of the State. It was therefore a duty for Congress to investigate the matters alleged. When I introduced that resolution I declined to yield to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] proposing to inquire into certain "cipher dispatches" in regard to the electoral vote of Oregon, because I insisted that it was not within the province of Congress to inquire into the individual misconduct of a private citizen which it could neither prevent nor punish, and that at any rate the investigation I proposed ought not to be overslaughed by such an inquiry. I did not then know of, I did not then suspect at all, the dispatches which have since been published; but the analogy between these dispatches and those into which the gentleman from Maine sought to institute an inquiry is complete; and the House having then sustained me in my view of the question it was not for me now to seek to set on foot myself an investigation of the kind; still less to invite one which might break up and prevent the completion of the work that we had in hand.

Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, there were personal reasons why I thought I ought not to propose any such investigation. The House may remember that when I introduced my resolution of inquiry the leading independent journal of my State declared that I did so in pursuance of a bargain between Governor Tilden and myself, for which I was to have his support. There was not the slightest truth in this conjecture. There are gentlemen now in this Chamber who know that when I was called upon on the afternoon previous to the introduction of that resolution to wait upon the joint committee of the democratic caucus, I was absolutely ignorant that I had been selected for that work, and had no more reason to suspect that I would be connected with it than had any other gentleman in the House.

The truth is not only did I have no bargain with Governor Tilden, but I had none with anybody else. I served simply because I was requested to serve by the joint committee of the caucus, and because in 1875, as a member of a committee of this House, I had visited Louisiana and had formed a very profound conviction alike of the dangers and of the wrongs of returning-board action. I introduced that resolution, therefore, on those accounts, and those alone; and not only had I no understanding nor bargain with any man upon the face of the earth, but I sought for no promise nor assurance from any one; and I had none. Yet, Mr. Speaker, that statement has gone all over the country; and nine-tenths of the people who have any opinion on the subject at all believe that I am the head of the committee of investigation as the confidant and agent of Governor Tilden. Beyond that, sir, although I have endeavored to conduct the investigation with absolute and judicial impartiality and fairness—so much so that I do not believe any man familiar with the record will rise and claim that such has not been the fact—and though, during all the time the committee has been sitting, I have preserved the most entire reticence in respect of the objects and purposes of the committee, as propriety and the rules of this House required, yet there has been no unworthy nor partisan speech which has not been falsely put into my month by the press nor any mean nor outrageous action which has not been falsely attributed to me.

Under such circumstances, for me to volunteer an investigation into the cipher dispatches was to have it said that I was doing so in the interest and for the purpose of protecting and whitewashing those whom the dispatches might affect.

Beyond that there are in my State some persons who think that I or my friends at one time had cause of grievance against Governor Tilden. It would be unavoidable, therefore, that if I volunteered any movement of the kind proposed by the resolution now before the House my action would be ascribed to personal dislike and spite. If gentlemen will look into the New York Tribune of Saturday week they will see it there declared that the most probable cause for the introduction of the resolution I have submitted is the purpose of personally injuring Mr. Tilden.

For these reasons, sir, I did not feel called upon to volunteer any action upon this subject, and I have not volunteered any. I introduce this resolution because, without any wish or request on my part, I have been instructed to do so by the committee which I represent, and I introduce it for no other reason.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add one word about the amount originally appropriated for the conduct of the committee and its expenditure. The House appropriated for the purpose the sum of $20,000. That has been expended as follows: For the subcommittee to Florida, including, of course, fees of witnesses and all other expenses, $2,400 in round numbers; for the first subcommittee to Louisiana, $5,500; for the second subcommittee to Louisiana, $800; for extra stenographers beyond the official force furnished by the House, $2,500; for expenses of witnesses for the main committee, $6,700; for the salaries of clerks, &c., $700; and for the personal expenses of the gentlemen of the committee, I mean their traveling and hotel expenses and the like, $1,300, which exhausts the sum that the House appropriated and leaves the committee with some unsettled bills, amounting to five hundred or a thousand dollars, yet to be discharged. I thought myself the sum of $5,000 would be quite enough to appropriate for the purpose of this cipher inquiry, but the gentlemen of the minority of the committee who were consulted about it suggested a larger sum, and to that we have agreed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have sought the ear of the House for the purpose of putting before its members the reasons which will influence my vote upon this resolution, let them avail as much or as little as they will.

I have in this matter neither "friends to reward, nor enemies to punish." I look upon it as a question of very considerable gravity as furnishing a precedent hereafter.

The resolution alleges there are certain cipher dispatches which are supposed to show that there were attempts by fraud or bribery to influence the casting or count of the electoral vote in Florida, Oregon, and South Carolina. The resolution does not allege there is any evidence expected to show any vote was influenced by those attempts. Then we have this case before us: we are brought to investigate acts of private citizens which were or were not crimes at the time they were done. If they were then crimes, the law will punish them; if they were not crimes, then we can make no ex post facto law which will reach them. What was attempted to be done, but was not done, requires no legislative remedy and no legislative action. Nor do we want to know about these things in order to make a law to prevent like acts in the future. We all know bribery and fraud in electoral counts can be used, and we need no set of inventions of one set of men in order to frame a law for their prevention. Therefore there is absolutely no grounnd for jurisdiction in this House to do what is proposed we shall do.

The only ground upon which this House can take jurisdiction of private persons and their acts, and a fortiori of private correspondence, whether by telegrams or the mail, is that the House requires the information in order to guide legislative action. That there can be no other ground I submit to the lawyers of the House, ay, to the good sense of every member of the House, upon which we can found our right to put our hands upon the acts of any private man or the correspondence of any private man; and he is a private man for this purpose who does not hold official United States position.

Now, without jurisdiction to act, what is expected to be got from these telegrams? It is expected that somebody will either be vindicated or be smutted, one or the other, and it is absolutely none of our business to do either, and above all to take the public money for that purpose. Never mind how high in party relations any private citizen may stand, never mind how it may effect any political party anywhere, these acts of private citizens are absolutely beyond our reach and ought to be beyond our reach. And above all we should not take the public money to gratify the prurient curiosity for scandal of anybody in the House or out of it. And in what we propose to do that is all we can accomplish.

It is supposed that a part of these dispatches have been published. I have no doubt supposed copies of some of them may have been published, but of that I have no knowledge. Whatever they may be, whatever has been published had better for the honor of the nation take its place among the emanations of the sensational journalism of the day than be put upon the public records of the Congress of the United States as a disgrace to the nation. A nation and its members should be like a family. Never investigate the private scandals of a family unless there is divorce prayed for on one side or the other, [laughter,] or it becomes necessary for the purpose of justice; and so, when there is no earthly advantage to be reached or gained, except to exhibit to the world the friction of the working of republican institutions to bring them into contempt, had we not better walk backward with the cloak over our shoulders and throw the mantle over what ought not to be seen.

Much has been said about these dispatches. Very wrong intimations have been made against a company which I have no particular reason to love—the Western Union Telegraph Company—of some wrong done on their part. It is due to them I should furnish the House and the country with the cause of the existences of these dispatches outside of their office, as they now exist. When the Senate of the United States ordered an investigation into some portion of this election matter in the winter of 1876–'77, a subpœna duces tecum was served on that company, and after they made so much resistance, as I am informed, that the whole executive committee were called under that subpœna, the cipher and other dispatches called for by that subpœna were delivered over to the committee of the Senate, and they examined a portion of them, and published the results of their examination quoad Oregon, I believe. But before they finished the Senate adjourned. The chairman of that committee died. The cipher dispatches were suffered to "lie around loose" would perhaps be the best phrase, and everybody dealt with them apparently as they chose to deal with them; and the company having lost jurisdiction over them, did not, and probably could not, resume it. Some of these dispatches unauthorized persons seem to have obtained. Therefore if you go into this investigation it will be but a fragmentary investigation. Although I do not know whether in the bundle of dispatches which I found on my table at the beginning of the sessions of this committee, or what the contents were, because they have never been translated or deciphered by me—and here allow me to say parenthetically, no one of which has been seen or read or copied by mortal man since they came into my hands for the purpose of public disclosure or in any way has been published and disclosed. I say they are only fragmentary, and you will not get the dispatches of both sides or all of the dispatches of one side.

Now, then, by whom is an investigation asked for. I give no secrets of the committee, for I was not present when the investigation was decided upon in that committee; but I am told by the newspapers that the republican gentlemen on the committee did not demand or desire it or take action on it, and that it was the act of the majority, of our friends on the other side. Therefore it is not promoted, I understand, in the interests of the republican party. I cannot conceive how it could be promoted in the interests of the democratic party. Which faction of that party desires to destroy a presidential candidate? [Laughter.] Who is at the bottom of this? Who desires to kill somebody in that party by cipher dispatches? Had we not better let all that alone? To my republican friends let me say, if it should turn out that these dispatches having been in the hands of a republican committee of the Senate, all the republican dispatches have been destroyed, is that a pleasant thing to contemplate, if that should so happen?

Now, I ask this House, in all soberness and fairness: first, have we any right to do this? Why, it was only the other day when a gentleman of this House begged with tears in his eyes that the House should proceed to an investigation and appoint a committee and employ the public money for the purpose of exonerating him from a load of obloquy which he said he did not deserve, and he desired above all things the aid of the House to clear him. The Speaker ruled rightly, and the House sustained the ruling almost unanimously, that in order to relieve one of our colleagues from unjust slander and unjust suspicion and unjust obloquy we had no power to investigate. Now, having no power to investigate for a good object, have we any more power to take the public money to investigate in order to be-smut and besmirch and bedim somebody who is not even a member of this House, and who cannot be before it unless you bring him by the strong arm of parliamentary power, given only for wise and great purposes? I submit that we ought not to do it, wholly independently of any results that may come from our action.

And the results are to be what? The great result to be gained is to stir up something that had better not be seen, felt or smelled. [Laughter.] That is all. That is all you are to gain by this expenditure of public money. Better give that $10,000 it will cost to some poor workingmen's families to carry them through the winter. [Laughter.]

Now let me say a word further upon this matter, and but a word; for I have given the reasons that will influence my vote; I shall vote against the resolution as a precedent. And I have simply desired this opportunity to put on record my protest so that hereafter if anybody should read about this matter they shall say: "Well, at least there was one man in a position to deal with the question as a lawyer, as a judge, as a member of Congress, and who in such a position was not to be influenced by any party prejudices, or party gain of any kind." Let me say also to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House, we have thirty-odd working days only before the close of our official term, with the business of the country disordered, its commerce off the seas, its industries paralyzed, its tariff unrevised—which tariff is supposed to paralyze those industries—its system of internal improvements not cared for. And do you not think that we have grander and nobler objects to contemplate in the remaining hours of our official life than stirring up private scandal, or private wrong-doings of private individuals that did not succeed? If they had succeeded, if any fraud attempted had succeeded in putting any man into the executive chair as President, that I think would have been a proper matter to investigate. But as they did not succeed, whoever attempted it took his labor for his pains and has taken nothing by his motion, and we have no business with that nothing which he took.

Mr. POTTER. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, there were certain questions revolving around this subject laid over at the last session. When the gentleman from New York presented his resolution at the mandate of his party caucus the objection was made upon this side that it did not present a question of privilege. That question was ruled upon by the Chair; it was decided to be a question of privilege and that the subject-matter was before the House. The subject-matter was the proposition to enter into certain events connected with the last presidential election postdating the election in November, 1876, and antedating the inauguration on March 4, 1877. Representing this side of the House I endeavored to introduce and have acted upon an amendment that extended the inquiry because it had been decided that the inquiry was a proper subject-matter to go into. Upon that I asked a vote and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] acting then I believe upon the dictates of the caucus behind him, declined to admit the amendment. I have examined the amendment lately, since seeing the proposition introduced to-day by the gentleman from New York. It covered almost identically the ground embodied in this resolution now before the House. It asked that the investigation should not be ex parte; that all of the ramifications of the events of those hurried and important days upon both sides should be investigated alike by this committee; that Oregon should be inquired into; the dispatches there; the South Carolina affair, and the Florida affair; because at that time there were rumors abroad that there had been a conspiracy the object of which was the corruption and purchase of members of the canvassing boards in the interest of Governor Tilden.

I thought then, as did my friends, that the inquiry should be made broad and ample.

The committee entered upon its duties, and after having adopted a proposition to take up one tale and another, presented by responsible or irresponsible persons, it went to one State or another to take testimony; and, at last, after certain cipher telegraph dispatches had been construed by an expert, and put upon the public mind by one of the leading papers of New York, they found themselves confronted with the questions that they had declined to act upon in the closing days of the last session, and they are not willing to remain longer in the position of refusing an examination which should be made broad and large.

I for one have not changed in my action. I do not understand that my party friends have changed. What they asked was, that when the machine was set in motion it should be permitted to roll on, and that it shall make the investigation upon the one side as well as the other.

I care nothing for the reasons that have been urged at this stage by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Originally when we were upon the threshold of this matter they might have had force, but to-day with me they have no force.

If there are cipher telegraph dispatches which the New York Tribune has not found out; if there is a single scrap of paper bearing upon this subject-matter in any State, which has been for partisan purposes destroyed—which I do not believe—then let this committee never rest day nor night until the parties who have destroyed these dispatches have been brought before the House.

Let them show to us fully, clearly, and explicitly the whole transaction between the time of the election and the time of the inauguration. Enough has been shown to indicate to the public mind the existence of a conspiracy that ought to be brought out. I have some personal sympathies. I do not want this committee to feel, during the trials of its noble life, any failures, or rummage around among the Jenkses, the Webers, and the Andersons. Let them take to themselves some subject where parties are interested of character enough to dignify their noble work.

I have some little sympathy for that simple-hearted old man in New York who by importunity was taken from his business and thrust upon the country as the presidential candidate, and who became the apostle of reform, the embodiment of all that element that has shouted fraud—who during the canvass and at its close awaited in his closet the verdict of the American people, taking no hand, part, or parcel in that notable campaign.

He has found himself surrounded with friends, relatives, conspirators, and nephews, who have attempted to force him upon the American people when he was defeated, and who have attempted to purchase, as these dispatches indicate, electoral colleges and canvassing boards.

The simple-hearted old man has had no opportunity to come before us or before any committee and picture, as he alone can picture, the character of the men close about him, endeavoring to blast his reputation and smirch his character and thrust him into the White House by a practice which no doubt he will come here and deny.

I would not have him miss the opportunity of being allowed to do this, so that he may be given the fullest scope and opportunity, and that the personal sympathies of my friend from Massachusetts, who, I know, when this appeal is made to him, will withdraw his objection, and that there will be unanimous consent given that this may go on, that justice be done and personal vindication may be made.

Allusion has been made to the gentleman from Michigan; and I yield to him the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has six minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I expected and have believed for many months that some means would be employed and some measures taken to prevent the investigation of the cipher dispatches, so called. In common with almost the entire body of the American people, I read the exposures made by the New York Tribune; the translations of these mysterious, hidden, Israelitish telegrams, with their Moses, and Adoniram, and Adonibezek, and all the hosts. And my love of scriptural history made me desire that the translations should be verified and the world enlightened.

The world was startled by those revelations, from the old man trembling with palsy as he heard his grandchild read from the Tribune and other papers those translations and exposures which startled his old, worn, weary heart with indignation, to the boy at school who read them. The whole country was shocked, ay, was horrified, at the idea that those dispatches might be true, that they were truly translated, and were connected, as was alleged, with a prominent citizen of the United States who was thought worthy by many to be the Chief Magistrate of this great Republic. If those dispatches had come from him, or had been sent through him or through his intimate friends, through members of his household, through his near neighbors who dwelt on either side of him among the hedges and plants of Gramercy Park, the country wanted to know about it.

I will venture to say that there is not a member in this House who did not for weeks before he came here to the capital believe that on the first opportunity, with a haste that could not be repressed, the gentleman from New York, or if not he then dozens of other gentlemen would spring to their feet at the very first moment when it might be permitted by the rules of the House, and almost in violation of the rules of the House in their eagerness to satisfy the demands of the American people, and offer a resolution of investigation. My friends on this side of the House when we met and the day passed, wondered what paralysis had fallen upon the fierce democracy.

Another day passed, and another, and in our little private talks among ourselves we were given up to wild conjecture as to the meaning of this sepulchral silence of the vast body of investigating democracy of this House. And we wondered and wondered, and were amazed. And yet days passed and weeks passed, and no voice alluded to the matter. We sat here silently, waiting with almost irrepressible impatience, and by a strong effort and constant urging of one another to wait and let the democracy have the honor of developing these great enormities, we kept ourselves quiet for two or three weeks without alluding to it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] says that "the gentleman from Michigan" might have introduced this resolution, or that any other gentleman might have done it. Sir, we would not take from the gentleman from New York that supreme moment of power and of honor which comes but once in the life of a man. I would not deny to him, the chairman of this committee, the opportunity to immortalize himself by prompt, vigorous, earnest action in directing his committee to ask for this investigation, if they already had not the power to make it. At length it was thought that the country would blame the republicans if they did not gently and quietly allude to this subject, and I made a modest allusion in my humble modest way. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have an opportunity to refer to the personalities which were used in reference to myself.

Mr. BUTLER. And I would like to have an opportunity to reply to a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. CONGER. And I would like to have an opportunity to reply to the reply. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asks an opportunity to reply to the personalities which were used in reference to himself.

Mr. EDEN. Will that be included in the hour allowed for the discussion of this subject?

The SPEAKER. If unanimous consent is given it will not be reckoned in the hour.

Mr. EDEN and others objected.

Mr. CONGER. I give notice that on an other occasion I will continue these remarks.

Mr. POTTER. I now yield to my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HEWITT. Personally I had no desire to take part in this discussion. But I foresaw that something would be said which would make it necessary for me at least to make some explanation of the circumstances which have led to this resolution.

With the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] as judge, lawyer, and member of Congress, I can take no exception. It will be remembered that when in the Forty-fourth Congress a motion was made in this House to commit the officers of the Western Union Telegraph Company for contempt for not producing the dispatches and telegrams, (probably those now under discussion,) I said to this House that I thought such a proceeding could not be defended upon any principle of justice or of law. But I was compelled to add that, as I had been the chairman of the national democratic committee at that time, I had never sent nor received a dispatch which might not be published, and I then and there authorized the officers of that company to produce them all and lay them before the committee of this House and before the country.

So now in reference to the pending proposition, while I make no controversy with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and can make none, I desire to remind him that there are occasions in life when there is something higher than even judge or lawyer or member of Congress. It is when the sense of manhood strikes into the human heart, and then in spite of law, in spite of precedent, the answer comes, let justice be done.

I stand here now to invite the fullest investigation of these telegrams, those that have been published and those which may not have seen the light, any and all telegrams which may affect the character and standing of any democrat who took part in the late presidential election, either as a candidate for office or as an officer or agent of any recognized democratic organization.

Whether the cipher telegrams published by the New York Tribune are genuine or not I have no means of knowing. I never received one of them. I never was in anywise cognizant of their existence until they were published by the Tribune. Neither do I know, nor have I any means of knowing, whether the alleged translations are correct or not. But this I know that not one of them containing reference to the use of money to influence returning boards or electoral votes was addressed to or received by any officer of the national democratic committee. I am aware that the newspapers have credited one of those persons with having been an officer of the democratic committee; but I say to this House and the country that that is an error. He never held any official connection with the committee. Those dispatches came from and were addressed to persons who held no official position in the organization. That they were zealous democrats, anxious, perhaps too anxious, to secure the fruits of the victory which we had clearly won in a contest of unparalleled effort on both sides, is very evident.

But what they did was action of a purely voluntary and individual nature, without consultation either with me who was charged with the conduct of the campaign or, as I am authorized to state, with the candidate of the democratic party in that memorable struggle. [Derisive laughter on the republican side.] Yes, gentlemen may laugh, because laughter may deafen them to the voice of honor and truth. I tell gentlemen upon the other side that when they laugh in this spirit it is because they fail to appreciate the manhood to which I ventured to call attention when I was replying to what had been said by the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The proposed investigation, if it should be ordered by the House, will establish this fact beyond all controversy; and it is for this reason that I trust it may be allowed to proceed, notwithstanding the plausible arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Justice to Samuel J. Tilden requires that the investigation should be made. Justice to the great democratic party whose chosen leader he was demands it. Justice to the American people who elected him to the highest office in their gift demands it. Justice to the fundamental principles on which free government is founded demands it.

It was intimated that gentlemen on the other side would sit in their seats and not vote upon this question; but I am glad to learn from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that we are at length to have the co-operation of the republican party in the vindication of Samuel J. Tilden. I accept it as the first evidence of repentance—[derisive laughter on the republican side]—yes, I accept it as the evidence of repentance, and I trust that hereafter they will bring forth "fruits meet for repentance." Their policy heretofore has been—ever since the award of the electoral tribunal by which the Presidency which rightfully belonged to Samuel J. Tilden was wrongfully awarded to Rutherford B. Hayes—to cover up the crime by which the people were defrauded of their rights by attacks upon the personal character of Mr. Tilden, expecting to overcome the popular sense of wrong by insisting that Mr. Tilden is no better man than Mr. Hayes.

With this object in view they have devoted themselves first to concealing all the traces of fraud on the republican side. Every person who had any connection with its perpetration has had his mouth closed by office, the dignity of which, from that of cabinet officer and foreign minister down to tide-waiter and tax-gatherer, has been carefully adjusted to the services rendered. So far as I can ascertain, not one man, or at most only one, has been omitted from the catalogue of tools, of whom it may be said, "Verily, they have their reward."

Mr. REED. I want to suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I decline to be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I supposed he would.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No; I do not yield. This is the only chance which the democrats have had to bring to the knowledge of this people the facts in this case, and now they will be brought out.

Mr. REED. I wanted to assist the gentleman a little.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has no right to interrupt the gentleman from New York without his consent.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The avenues of testimony being thus closed, all other evidences of complicity have been destroyed. Republican letters and telegrams have, as it is generally believed—but there may be a mistake about it—alike disappeared, while every scrap of writing or telegraphic communication which could be tortured into evidence of democratic guilt or folly has been carefully hunted up, preserved, and by the agency of an omnipotent press, with almost fiendish ingenuity, made to do duty in the damning work of defaming Samuel J. Tilden and assailing the democratic leaders. The frauds by which the votes of Florida and Louisiana were wrongly counted for Hayes are sought to be offset by the allegation that Mr. Tilden tried to purchase these votes and failed. In other words, the mistaken zeal of some of his indiscreet friends to secure his just rights by wrong methods is paraded as the justification for the transfer to Mr. Hayes of the votes of States which gave an unquestionable majority for Tilden.

They are aware, however, that the common sense of the people of this country will reject all such miserable subterfuges intended to confuse the wrong with the right, unless they can connect Mr. Tilden with these transactions, and the most diligent efforts have been made to show that he had personal knowledge of the operations of his overzealous friends. Now, I stand here to declare that there is not a particle of evidence to connect him with this knowledge. On the contrary, the evidence, as far as produced, (and the production of it has been most skillfully managed to give an opposite impression,) proves conclusively that he had no such knowledge; for in no case was any purchase of votes effected, and in every case it broke down for want of money. Is it to be supposed for a moment that if Samuel J. Tilden had decided to buy these votes the purchase would have failed for want of money? Is it not absolutely clear that when it reached the point where money was required the negotiation failed? And is not the conclusion irresistible that when in the last resort it was necessary to go to him for means he indignantly stamped upon the suggestion as one to which he could give neither approval nor assistance.

Let Mr. Tilden have the opportunity to confront his accusers, traducers, maligners before a competent tribunal. Let the man who of right to-day should occupy the executive chair go upon the witness-stand, if need be, to satisfy the American people and the world that at least one of the candidates of the two great parties, whose existence is essential to the maintenance of free government, is not a miserable trickster, willing to make bargains for the highest office in the gift of the people, every hour's wrongful occupation of which only intensifies the dishonor of its acquisition and the humiliation of its possession.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, so that there may be further debate on this subject.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, there were—ayes 108, noes 116.

Mr. ATKINS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 124, nays 120, not voting 44; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. ATKINS to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. SOUTHARD, is paired with his colleague, Mr. COX. Mr. SOUTHARD would vote "ay;" Mr. COX "no."

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I am paired with Mr. ELLSWORTH. If he were here, I would vote in the affirmative and he would vote in the negative.

Mr. HARTZELL. I am paired with Mr. PHILLIPS. If he were present, he would vote in the negative and I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CARLISLE. My colleague, Mr. MCKENZIE, is absent by order of the House with the committee accompanying the remains of Mr. Schleicher, and is paired with Mr. POWERS, of Maine, who is also absent on the same committee.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. SOUTHARD. If he were here, he would vote in the affirmative and I would vote in the negative. My colleague, Mr. GARDNER, is paired with my other colleague, Mr. DICKEY.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague, Mr. BRENTANO, is absent by order of the House with the committee attending the remains of Mr. Schleicher.

Mr. ROBBINS. My colleagues, Mr. VANCE and Mr. YEATES, are detained from the House by illness. If they were present, they would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MARTIN. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is paired with Mr. CRAPO. If here, he would vote in the affirmative and Mr. CRAPO in the negative.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. CLYMER is detained at his room by illness. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I am paired with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. FREEMAN. I vote in the negative if permitted.

Mr. ATKINS. Was the gentleman within the bar before the last name on the roll was called?

Mr. FREEMAN. I was not, but I ask permission to vote.

Mr. ATKINS and Mr. EDEN objected.

Mr. FREEMAN. I only desire to say I am just recovering from serious illness and could not sooner reach the House. Is there objection to my vote?

The SPEAKER. Objection being made the gentleman's vote cannot be received.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. There is one minute remaining of the time allotted for debate.

Mr. POTTER. I call for a vote on the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. POTTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the usual post-route bill. It contains no general legislation, but merely provides for additional post-routes.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads asks unanimous consent to report from that committee the usual post-route bill, under the assurance that it contains no general legislation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADDELL, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6126) to establish post-routes in the several States herein named; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. When assurance has been given by the gentleman reporting the bill it contains nothing but post-routes, and no general legislation of any sort, the reading of the bill is dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

Mr. WADDELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALCASIEU LOG SEIZURES.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twelve minutes past three o'clock, and the call of committees for reports rested with the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. ACKLEN. I understood, Mr. Speaker, there was a resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] which comes over as the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. There is that unfinished business of the morning hour. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a select committee of three members who shall employ a clerk, stenographer, and deputy sergeant-at-arms, and proceed to the State of Louisiana at such time as said committee shall determine, with full power to sit during the recess, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony. It shall be the duty of said committee to investigate, as far as they may deem necessary, the charges of corruption and malfeasance in office preferred against M. A. Carter, special agent of the Interior Department, and the parties connected with the Calcasieu log seizures.

Mr. SAYLER. What recess is referred to?

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. It is unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. But I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SAYLER. It is evident this was intended for the Christmas recess.

The SPEAKER. This resolution was introduced on the 4th of June last, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is then no necessity for its adoption now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read a paragraph in the Manual.

The Clerk read as follows:

The question of consideration is not precluded by an affirmative vote on a motion to adjourn. The "unfinished" business pending at the time of the adjournment is still subject to the question of "consideration." The motion to adjourn precluding it on the previous day.

The SPEAKER. By analogy the Chair thinks it is in order to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I raised that question because the Committee on the Judiciary, reporting this resolution, I understood asked for its recommittal.

Mr. ACKLEN. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. CULBERSON,] who reported the resolution from the Committee on the Judiciary, is now present.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have an amendment to propose which I think will obviate the objection made to the resolution, so far as the recess is concerned.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas offer an amendment on the part of the committee?

Mr. CONGER. I raised the question of consideration because I understood the committee wished to have it postponed.

Mr. CULBERSON. The committee did informally this morning direct a certain course should be pursued in relation to this resolution, but subsequent to the adjournment of that committee I was requested by a majority of its members to let the resolution take its course, with the amendment I now offer to it.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration. I should like to know whether the gentleman moves the amendment from any action taken in the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is not reported from the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. The point I make is that the question of consideration cannot be raised in the morning hour; that under the rules of the House when the morning hour has begun reports of committees are in order; and this being a report of a committee the House must dispose of it in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. This is a report of a committee but it comes over as unfinished business; and the gentleman will find a decision made, Journal, 2, 44, p. 252, that the question of consideration could be raised against the unfinished business.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the House, but not in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. This is in the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. But in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That is a part of the time of the House; we are not in committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true, but we are acting under a rule which requires the House to consider at this time reports of committees and reports of committees alone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House at all times has power to control its business by a majority. The question of consideration can be raised against this report, which comes over as unfinished business; and if the House should refuse to consider it, it would then proceed to the next order in the morning hour, which would be reports from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. We are now in the morning hour, as I understand?

The SPEAKER. Yes, this is the morning hour. This is not a question between unfinished business and something else with which some member might antagonize it, but it is a question of considering this unfinished business; and if the House determines not to consider it, then the House will proceed with the regular order, which is the receiving of reports from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. When a question is before the House the rule provides that it may be disposed of by a motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, to amend, or to postpone indefinitely. But I submit that when a report from a committee is before the House it must pass upon it in some way or other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question of consideration can be raised.

The question being put, "Will the House consider the report?" there were—ayes 43, noes 99.

Mr. ACKLEN. I call for tellers. This will not occupy fifteen minutes.

Tellers were not ordered, only sixteen members voting therefor; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the House refused to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. Reports from committees are still in order, and the call rests with the Committee on War Claims.

WILLIAM DADDS.

Mr. REILLY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6127) for the relief of William Dadds, of Annapolis, Maryland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. M. BRAEG AND OTHERS.

Mr. REILLY also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 415, a bill (H. R. No. 6128) for the relief of J. M. Bragg and others, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. SAULPAN.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 1390) for the relief of George W. Saulpan; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF JOHN WATERS.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 955) for the relief of the estate of John Waters, deceased; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. BROWER.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. In the absence of my colleague on the Committee on War Claims, the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHELLEY,] I report back from that committee with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1626) for the relief of George W. Brower, and move that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report printed.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES MILLER.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6129) for the relief of James Miller, of Bourbon County, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH B. HIGGINS AND OTHERS.

Mr. MARTIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6130) for the relief of Elizabeth B. Higgins, Joel Higgins, and Brand Higgins, of Phillips County, Arkansas; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask for the present consideration of this bill.

The bill was read. It refers the claim of Elizabeth B. Higgins, Joel Higgins, and Brand Higgins, children and heirs at law of Richard Higgins, deceased, of Phillips County, Arkansas, for property alleged to have been taken and converted to the use of the Government by the United States Army during the war to the Court of Claims for adjudication, according to the laws as to loyalty and the taking and conversion of property governing the commissioners of claims in like cases.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point of order that this bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the bill to be read again. The Chair does not see that it appropriates any money.

Mr. MARTIN. It does not.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. It contemplates an appropriation.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Almost every bill does that.

Mr. BUTLER. We cannot under this bill take any money out of the Treasury until a new appropriation is made.

Mr. CONGER. I think the language of the rule is such as requires the reference of this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Otherwise we might send all these claims to the Court of Claims without their being considered in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BUTLER. That bill does not require any appropriation. If the Court of Claims should make an adjudication it cannot be paid until a new appropriation is made.

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House has been not to allow a point of order to rest against claims that are to be sent to the Court of Claims, and the Chair's immediate predecessor decided that where a bill may incidentally involve expense, but does not directly require an appropriation, it does not necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth B., Joel, and Brand Higgins, having considered the same, report as follows:

The petitioners, Elizabeth B. Higgins, Joel Higgins, and Brand Higgins, are the children and heirs at law of Richard Higgins, deceased. They reside in Phillips County, Arkansas, and resided there before and during the war. The property claimed for is live-stock and farm produce valued at $40,045, and 40 bales of cotton valued at $25,000, making $65,045. Richard Higgins, who owned this property in his life-time, died in April, 1862, before any of it was taken. Two of the petitioners, Joel and Brand, were minors during the war, the eldest being about fifteen years of age when the war closed. Josiah Johnson, Isaac Waters, and Harriet Johnson testify to the taking of the property. They each swear that they were present and saw it taken. Their statements are quite full.

The petitioners state that they did not file their claim before the southern claims commission because they did not know of such commission until it was too late to file their claim by reason of the expiration of the time limited for filing claims. They reside eighteen miles southwest from Helena, Arkansas; two of them were minors in 1871, when the commission was created; the third is a female. It is quite likely that the existence of the commission might not have come to their knowledge in time to enable them to file their claim.

It may be observed that the commission did not have jurisdiction of the claim for the cotton. No remedy has been afforded for claims of that kind since the expiration of the two years following the close of the war. The two males, Joel and Brand, were then minors.

Your committee are of opinion that the claim is a prima facie one, and that the petitioners ought to be allowed a fair opportunity to present it. They therefore report the accompanying bill referring the same to the Court of Claims for adjudication, and recommend its passage.

Mr. CONGER. I submit of course to the ruling of the Chair in this case, but I would call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is no one of all the war claims that can be presented but that may be embraced in a bill like this and sent to the Court of Claims without being subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman that they ought to be subject to the point of order and only regrets that he cannot so decide.

Mr. CONGER. I call attention to the fact that this claim if referred to the court would involve an expenditure of money from the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be wrong, but the Chair thinks the gentleman himself knows that when the bill reported by himself, known as the Dahlgren bill, was pending it was not referred to a committee.

Mr. CONGER. There was no point of order made upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there was, but the Chair will not assert it.

The Chair thinks that this is a defect in the rule, but the majority of the House do not seem to agree with the Chair, and have not changed the rule. The Chair agrees with the gentleman that everything likely to take money out of the Treasury ought to be subject to a point of order, but the gentleman will recollect that money is the motive power in all legislation here. The Chair will cause to be read the decision that was made upon the point of order in the Dahlgren case.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BENJAMIN W. HARRIS also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. No. 5049) authorizing a settlement of the claim of the estate of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren, reported the same without amendment.

The House having proceeded to its consideration,

Mr. BRAGG made the point of order that the said bill must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore overruled the point of order on the ground that the bill contained no appropriation of money or property, but proposed only a reference of the case to the Court of Claims to determine whether or not the Government was indebted to said claimant.

Mr. HARRIS demanded the previous question; which was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was engrossed and read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that the point that was made there in that case is similar to the one made now.

Mr. CONGER. There was a special limitation upon the power of the court in that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot take cognizance of any limitation. The Chair approves the vigilance of the gentleman from Michigan, but is unable to give him the relief he wants. The Chair regrets that he cannot carry out the views which he honestly entertains, but he will co-operate with the gentleman from Michigan whenever it comes to taking money out of the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

M. BARRON AND H. P. AND W. GORMAN.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 6131) for the relief of Maggie Barron and Henry P. Gorman and Walter Gorman; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that the claim of Maggie Barron, of Maury County, Tennessee; Henry P. Gorman, of Fayette County, Tennessee; and Walter Gorman, of Benton County, Mississippi, for property alleged to have been taken and used by the United States Army during the war shall be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication, both as to the loyalty of the claimants and the alleged conversion of the property, according to the laws governing the commissioners of claims in like cases.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition for the relief of Maggie Barron, Henry P. Gorman, and Walter Gorman, having considered the same, report as follows:

The petitioners, Maggie Barron, Henry P. Gorman, and Walter Gorman, are the heirs and legal representatives of George Gorman, deceased. The two former reside, respectively, in Maury and Fayette Counties, Tennessee, and the latter in Benton County, Mississippi. George Gorman owned the property claimed for at the time it was taken. He resided in Marshall (now Benton) County, Mississippi, and died in 1869. The claim is for stock and farm produce alleged to have been taken and used by the United States Army during the war, of the estimated value of $9,870.

The petitioners were all minors during the war, the eldest, Maggie Barron, being less than sixteen years of age when the war closed. George Gorman was about eighty-seven years of age when he died. He took the oath of allegiance to the United States in December, 1862, which is filed with the petition. Richard H. Parham and Littleton H. Wilburn swear to his loyalty. Parham testifies as follows:

"I can say that he was a stanch Union man—one who avowed his sentiments publicly and privately upon all occasions. I have heard him say time and again that the confederacy would not succeed, and that it ought not to succeed. * * * It is my earnest and honest heart-felt conviction that if there ever was a loyal man George Gorman was one."

Wilburn says:

"There was not a more stanch, outspoken man in America. He had no concealment of his opinions and spoke them out at all times and places. He would denounce the war, separation, and the confederate authorities without stint or mercy, and seemed to delight in expressing his contempt for them and his devotion to the Union of the States and the flag of our country. He always said that the confederacy would fail and the United States Government stand for all time," &c.

The first-named witness has been adjudged loyal by the southern claims commission, under the act of March 3, 1871. The last testifies that he has always been a Union man.

Parham, Wilburn, William Gorman, and Henry Gorman testify to the taking of the property by the Federal Army. The testimony of the last two is quite full and circumstantial. They say they were present and saw the various items charged taken.

The reason assigned for not having presented the claim before is that George Gorman placed his claim in the hands of attorneys at Memphis, Tennessee, for prosecution soon after the close of the war; that there was then no jurisdiction for such claims arising in Mississippi; that such jurisdiction was not afforded until the creation of the southern claims commission in 1871; that meanwhile Gorman died, and in the course of the administration of his estate the matter was not brought to the attention of the petitioners until 1874, a year or more after the time limited for the filing of claims had expired.

Your committee are of opinion that the petition and proofs attached present a prima facie case, both as to the question of loyalty and the taking of the property. They therefore report the accompanying bill, referring the claim to the Court of Claims, and recommend its passage.

Mr. BRAGG. It seems to me a little strange that with a case where the proofs are so clear and the committee are so thoroughly satisfied of the justice of the claim that there can be no doubt either as to the amount of the claim or the loyalty of the claimant, they should shrink from the responsibility of reporting a bill to this House for paying the claim. The fact that they do so shrink leads me almost to think that this is a new way which has been discovered by which the sense of this House is not to be taken upon claims which may be known as southern war claims, but that the responsibility is to be shifted to somebody else, so that when a verdict may be rendered we may hold up our hands and say, "Thou canst not say I did it." I hope this bill will not pass.

Mr. MARTIN. I am a little astonished at the objection made by the gentleman on my left, [Mr. BRAGG,] for the simple reason that he ought to be able, as the rest of us are I apprehend willing, to trust a court that was instituted for the very purpose of adjudicating matters of this kind. I am surprised when the gentleman objects to the court considering a claim of this kind.

I regard it as infinitely preferable to refer such claims as this to a court than to have them heard and considered here. In the court witnesses may be heard upon both sides; doubtless will be. Here the testimony is only ex parte. For the protection of the Government and for the ample vindication of the rights of the claimant, it seems to me proper that this claim should go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. REILLY. As a member of the committee reporting this bill, and in answer to the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] I think I can satisfy his mind. It will be borne in mind that all this class of claims before Congress is based upon ex parte testimony. The Government is not represented; the witnesses are not cross-examined. The affidavits are simply ex parte, taken before a commissioner or some other person authorized to take them in different parts of the country.

In this case the testimony was very strong, considering that it was ex parte. It was enough to satisfy the committee looking at it from that stand-point, of the merits of the claim; but we did not think the proof was sufficient to warrant us to report a bill taking money out of the Treasury where the Government itself had not been represented.

Under the provisions of this bill the parties can go into a court regularly constituted, where the Government will be represented, where they will have an opportunity, if they see proper, to present witnesses to antagonize this claim, where they will be represented by counsel, and in that way justice can be much more fully done than here. In our report we refrain from expressing any opinion beyond the fact that this presents a prima facie case of such merit that the party should have an opportunity to be heard in a court of justice.

Mr. POTTER. Why did not these parties go before the southern claims commission?

Mr. MARTIN. The original claimant died in 1869, and these parties are his children. The southern claims commission was not established till 1871.

Mr. POTTER. Would the commissioners of southern claims have had jurisdiction of this claim?

Mr. MARTIN. Probably they would have had.

Mr. POTTER. Where was the property taken?

Mr. MARTIN. In Mississippi.

Mr. POTTER. All the property in this case?

Mr. MARTIN. Permit me to remark that it seems to me no injury can be done to any one by passing this bill, which simply proposes to allow these parties to go before the Court of Claims at their own expense. If they fail they will get nothing; if they establish their claim they surely ought to have the money.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I wish to ask the gentleman from West Virginia whether this House did not at the last session by a nearly three-fourth vote pass a general bill referring all bills of this character to the Court of Claims. I refer now to what is known as the "Potter bill," which has not been acted upon, I learn, at the other end of the Capitol. Such having been the expression of the sense of the House, it seems to me that the position of the gentleman from West Virginia and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is eminently sound. If these parties have been loyal to the Government, if the Government has taken their property, and if under the limitation prescribed by the Government they were not allowed to sue, being debarred by infancy or any other cause, it is but an act of simple justice to refer their claim to the court—justice to the Government and justice to them.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill is of more importance than the House seems to regard it. First let me say in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] that the bill which passed this House at the last session, referring to the Court of Claims the judicial ascertainment of the facts in all matters of private claims, was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and by that committee reported adversely to the Senate and there defeated.

Now, my difficulty with this bill is not that it proposes to refer the inquiry of the facts involved to a judicial tribunal. I am always in favor of that. The bill which I reported covered all cases of private claims, and forbade the consideration by Congress of any claim until the facts had been judicially ascertained by the Court of Claims, instead of by a committee, as now. My difficulty with this bill, I repeat, is not that it provides for a judicial ascertainment of facts, but that it provides for payment to the claimants if the facts be established, while there is not by law any liability to them. Once for all, let it be remembered that where property within the enemy's lines was taken or destroyed by our troops in carrying on the war the Government of the United States is not liable for such property by the laws of nations and of war unless it chose to assume such liability. That it did see fit to do, as regards the property taken from loyal citizens, for a limited time. But its liability for such claims ended with the limitation which Congress provided in the bill establishing the southern claims commission.

Mr. MARTIN. Would the gentleman prescribe or enforce a statute of limitation against infants?

Mr. POTTER. No, Mr. Speaker; but this is not a question of a statute of limitation; it is a question of the restoration of a mere statutory right, of a right which never existed except by positive law, which positive law declared that it must be asserted within a certain number of years, which number of years has expired, so that the right is gone. And the question is whether in this case, or in any case, or in all cases, that right shall be restored. If we are going to give one loyal claimant the right to come in after the limitation originally provided has expired, we ought to give it to every such citizen, and we ought not to begin by referring to the Court of Claims a single one of these war claims and directing that court to adjudicate and allow it in preference to all the rest, or without understanding that this bill is the first step in that road and being prepared to travel it through.

At any rate the House ought to understand that this is one of a mass of claims for losses sustained by men at the South during the war, which claims were for a time allowable, if I may use the term, by the law establishing the southern claims commission, but which are no longer so.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will my friend answer me one question?

Mr. POTTER. I will answer with pleasure anything I can.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Does the gentleman hold that it is right and equitable upon the part of a government seeking to do justice among its citizens or subjects, to give certain rights to adults, and persons who are capable of suing, and to deny the same rights to parties who are unable to sue by reason of infancy, coverture, or insanity? Does the gentleman believe that there is any justice in a proposition like that?

Mr. POTTER. No, Mr. Speaker, but that is not this case. Within the time allowed by law a great many southern loyalists applied to the southern claims commission and had their claims allowed; but others (some because they could not do so in time, some because they did not take the trouble to be in time, and some for other reasons) did not apply. Now it is said that the whole southern country is full of claims of this kind which will be pressed the moment we give the claimants a right and opportunity to enforce them—claims the amount of which will go far to exhaust the Treasury of the United States in their payment. Now we on this side of the House have asserted that we did not intend either to provide payment of these claims nor to establish a tribunal in which they can be enforced; and gentlemen will remember that in the late debate on William and Mary college the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] said the South did not expect nor demand that we should do so.

Now, I agree that if this claim is to be considered and allowed at all the place to consider it is a court of justice. But this bill not only directs an ascertainment of the facts of the claim; it provides further that the claim shall be paid when the facts are established. Yes, it does, although the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] shakes his head.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman could show that the bill contained any appropriation the Chair would hold it to be subject to a point of order.

Mr. POTTER. Oh, there is no provision in it, Mr. Speaker, for a direct appropriation of money; that is not what I mean when I say it provides for payment; but it provides for the judgment of the Court of Claims according to the law governing the southern claims commission; that is, it provides for a recovery against the United States if the facts bear out the claimants. Now, that is simply to renew for the benefit of these parties a jurisdiction that we gave to the southern claims commission, which jurisdiction has now expired. If we renew it for one loyal claimant we should renew it for all. This bill means that we shall provide for paying the hundreds of millions of dollars which the republican journals say the loyal southerners mean to take out of the Treasury. I do not believe the people of the South as a whole want these claims provided for, and I am not going to take the first step which shall open the door to such payment when I do not think we are bound to do it by right, and do not believe it will now be for the advantage of either section to do it by favor.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. POTTER. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the distinguished gentleman from New York to have been in favor of a bill that would pay all these claims in some form or other through the interposition of a court; but as he could not pay them all, he would not now pay any of them.

Mr. POTTER. Oh, no

Mr. KEIFER. That is the gentleman's proposition as I gathered it from his bill, which passed by so large a vote at a former session of this Congress.

Mr. POTTER. That did not provide for the payment of any one of these claims.

Mr. KEIFER. It looked to the payment of all of this class of claims.

Mr. POTTER. No, sir; it did not look to any such thing. It looked to the ascertainment of the facts and reporting them to this House; and had the facts of this claim been ascertained under that bill it would have given an opportunity to Congress to then say whether it be one of those claims which should be paid. If the House means to begin the payment of this class of claims, let it understand what it is doing.

Mr. KEIFER. I of course yield to the gentleman when he insists, but I do insist my statement is correct. He is, however, mistaken about this bill, for it does not provide anywhere for a payment of this claim.

Mr. POTTER. But it provides for the adjudication of the claim in the Court of Claims and for a recovery, a judgment there if established.

Mr. KEIFER. It provides for adjudication by the Court of Claims, applying to it the law which has been made applicable to cases of like character before the southern claims commission. The effect of the adjudication of this claim by the Court of Claims under this bill, should it become a law, will be the same as under the omnibus bill of the gentleman from New York. The latter clause of this bill has been carefully drawn. It was so drawn in order that the Court of Claims should not take the report of this committee as conclusive of the question of loyalty or of the question of the taking or conversion of the property for which the claim is made. The latter clause of the bill was intended to entirely free that court from any action of the committee or Congress, and it was put there for the purpose of guarding against the very thing which the gentleman says we are in danger of doing. I am not satisfied by the ex parte testimony which was before the committee that these parties were loyal during the war. I am satisfied so far as there was any evidence, or what possibly might be called evidence, before the committee, that it showed they were loyal, but I am not certain that it is true, and I will not accept it, it being ex parte testimony, as conclusive of that question. It frequently turns out when questions of this kind are judicially investigated, when testimony is taken properly, that the parties were not loyal. I know a very noted case. A very distinguished gentleman had a claim before the commissioners of claims——

Mr. BRAGG. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. If this bill revives the law and the rule of evidence established for the claims commission in this particular case, does it not in fact revive that legislation and make it applicable to one case, whereas all other cases will be excluded from the benefit of it?

Mr. KEIFER. That is coming back to the same thing I understood my friend from New York to favor; that is, he would not pay one claim, however just, that may come within our consideration here because we could not pay them all. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, we have paid millions upon millions of dollars under the general law and through the interposition of the commissioners of claims, called improperly southern claims commissioners; we have paid, I have said, through their interposition millions upon millions of dollars of claims of like character to this one, assuming these parties to have been loyal and that these goods were taken and used by the United States authorities for the benefit of the Government.

Let me say, sir, that it is not proposed to enter upon the payment of claims generally for property taken or destroyed in the South either to loyal or disloyal parties. That is not the proposition; but if these goods were commissary stores or quartermaster stores which were taken from or furnished by loyal parties to the United States Army, of which the Army had the benefit—used for the benefit of the United States—then we propose to pay for them as we have been paying millions of dollars for like property, even though the claimants happened to live in the South, if we find they were loyal.

Now that is a policy which was entered upon long ago; but there we have stopped, and there I propose to stand so far as I am concerned.

Mr. POTTER. Then I understand the gentleman to say if these parties were loyal and if the goods which were taken were goods of the class he speaks of, then they ought to be paid notwithstanding the expiration of the law establishing the southern claims commission.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman states one of the troubles I have had some difficulty with myself all through. There are, however, a great many people, unfortunately, who come here with claims having never heard of this limitation. Some were minors and could not have known or understood the application of the law. It may be we are opening up a statute in this case, possibly, which we ought not to do, but on representations made to us and on the evidence before the committee it thought this was a proper case to open a statute and let in these parties. That is one reason why we should not like to pass a general law to apply to all cases. If a man knowingly slept on his rights when the statute gave him a remedy he should be permitted to sleep on. Statutes of limitation are for repose as well as in the interest of peace.

Mr. REILLY. I should like to ask a question in regard to the point of payment involved in this bill. Does the gentleman from New York understand under the law that judgments of the Court of Claims are to be paid at once? On the contrary do they not have first to be reported to Congress before there is an appropriation?

Mr. POTTER. I am glad to answer the gentleman. Of course nothing can be actually paid without an appropriation first made by Congress, for the Treasury would otherwise not have the means of payment. Appropriation bills are not bills for ascertaining or declaring what is due, they are bills for providing the money to pay what has otherwise been declared by Congress to be payable. And when a claim has once been established by the judgment of the Court of Claims then all question of the liability of the Government to pay it is ended and it becomes as much the duty of Congress to provide the means to pay it with as to redeem its Treasury notes.

Mr. REILLY. But you said the bill provided for payment.

Mr. POTTER. Yes, I mean the right to payment, not the means of payment; for by the judgment of the Court of Claims the debt against the United States is thereby established and the question of its validity is ended. Now the difference between this particular bill and the general bill I introduced was, that that provided for bringing the claims back to Congress with nothing but the facts in each case ascertained and the recommendation of the court thereon, for Congress to say whether the claim so established as matter of fact should be paid or not. This bill if it becomes a law will authorize the Court of Claims to give a judgment for the amount due, for which an appropriation ought then to be made. I understand this bill like the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] to be the revival for this particular claim of the relief afforded by the southern-claims commission bill. There is no such thing as a legal liability on the part of the Government in favor of loyal or disloyal people for property taken by the Army in the enemy's country. Such sufferers have no natural right of recovery for such losses. Congress did see fit to create a special liability for those in the South whom we style loyal citizens. The liability thus created has expired. This bill proposes to revive it. I think it is a dangerous thing to do, and I want it understood that one democrat stands here opposed on that subject to the distinguished republican from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question: whether he is opposed to the general policy of that original law?

Mr. POTTER. Frankly, yes; I am now opposed to its revival. The war has been over for some fifteen years. The loyal men of the South have had an opportunity to present their claims. To now at this late day give them another opportunity would be to open the door to a vast army of claimants, many of whom are without merit. The question of a man's loyalty who was South during the late war is one of the most uncertain and illusive of questions. Proof of some sort indicating that he was dissatisfied at some time with the rebellion or with its leaders can be collected in regard to almost any man there. And the temptation that would be held out to get up pretended claims and for claimants to assume to have been loyal would be very great. From all I can learn from gentlemen from that section, I think the general opinion at the South is that few of these claims are honest; that more injustice than justice would be done by reviving them; that they afford a constant ground for irritation, misconstruction, and mistrust; and that the South would on the whole be better off if it were once for all understood that the opportunity to assert such claims would not be revived.

On the whole, therefore, I think it is better for the South, better for the North, better for the whole country, that the matter should be treated as settled, and that it should be understood that no one of these war claims will be paid, and that we should say, once for all, frankly, that we will not pay them. [Applause from the republican side.] The North does not want these claims paid; the South itself as a whole does not demand their payment, and no step looking to the payment of such claims should be taken by this House now.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask the gentleman from West Virginia to yield to me for a few moments before he calls the previous question.

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. I know with what approval members upon this floor may receive remarks made against paying southern claims. The position taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] is a popular one, perhaps, before the country. But before this debate closes to-day, I desire to say that I believe, limited as I have already stated to the payment for property taken from loyal persons by the United States officers or furnished by such persons to the United States officers for the express use of the Army in suppressing the rebellion in the South, the policy of paying these claims is a wise one. I believe it is wise because we will not say to these people down South who were loyal throughout the war, loyal when it cost something to be loyal—we will not say to them that what they furnished to the Army freely, in order that the war might be carried on, they shall now be robbed of. This would be saying to the people down South who had their property there, and tendered it freely to the United States to aid in putting down the rebellion, and who were loyal throughout the entire war, "We will not pay you because you were so unfortunate as to live in a country that was disloyal." Many members fail to distinguish between claims of southern loyal men and what are generally called "rebel claims."

I stand upon the doctrine that was long ago announced in the other end of this Capitol by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, Senator Morton, by Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, and others, that it was a wise policy to pay certain claims presented by loyal men from whatever section of the country they came. If we fail to do this we put the loyal men in disloyal districts exactly upon a par with the disloyal people in disloyal districts. That is a position which I do not desire to take, popular or unpopular.

For the sake of the future of this country, if even we are to forget the past, I am in favor, in proper cases, of distinguishing between the loyal and the disloyal, and always in favor of the former.

Rebel claims should never be paid. All claims arising out of the general ravages of war should not be paid to loyal or disloyal persons. Supplies furnished by or taken from loyal parties North and South should be paid for as a matter of right, and such has been the policy of this Government from the beginning, and I trust it may ever continue to be.

Mr. MARTIN. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say in response to what has fallen from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] on this side of the House, that I think if he understood properly the propositions of his own bill he would not have criticised the one offered by this committee in the way he has done. Every claim against the Government should stand upon its own foundation. As I understand the provisions of this bill, it simply proposes to compensate parties whose goods were taken by the Government of the United States, and who were minors at the time, and who, therefore, were not embraced within the provisions of the former law. Upon every principle which belongs to that law for which the gentleman from New York expresses so much respect, I undertake to assert that neither in the country from which we borrow alike our laws and our language nor in any other civilized community has there ever been a statute of limitations that did not except minors, femmes convert, insane persons, and those incapable of taking advantage of the law. The bill introduced by the gentleman from New York himself, to which I gave my assent, proposed to include claims, just and proper in themselves, presented by loyal citizens; and if the gentleman from New York had had the misfortune to go from New York to reside for a year or two in the South and had there had all his property destroyed by the Union Army while he himself was loyal in Mississippi as he had been loyal in New York, would he not have thought it a very hard thing if his Government had said, "We will not pay this debt?"

Why, sir, his own proposition proposes the following:

"Be it enacted, &c., That any person who may have a claim against the United States of which the Court of Claims would not now have jurisdiction, but founded upon equity and justice, and not barred by the statute of limitation provided by the laws of the United States, may file his claim in that court.

The man above all men who stood higher than all others in judicial acumen and legal learning, Judge Story, said that it was a disgrace to this free and enlightened country when in the most despotic governments in the Old World a citizen who had a claim against the government had a right to go to the court and demand his pay.

There was no such right here; and this sentiment thus uttered by this great lawyer and judge was carried out in the Court of Claims.

And now, sir, to-day you have in the Treasury of the United States $34,000,000 of captured and abandoned property. You have $15,000,000 which you acknowledge does not belong to the Government of the United States, and never can be mingled with the other funds in the Treasury, but it must stand there forever as a sacred fund to pay debts you acknowledged that you gathered from those who were loyal in the South.

And while I admit that there are few exceptions to this, yet I know that there were some persons who were loyal there, and if you took their property you did it as a trustee, with the intention and purpose when they came with their claims to return it to them, and this is one of that class of claims.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired and the bill goes over until the next morning hour.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 854) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis, in the State of California; and

A bill (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

First. What, if any, additional legislation is necessary to enable the proper auditing officers of the Treasury to audit and allow all claims for work and labor actually performed under the late board of public works of the District of Columbia, and now on file in the Treasury Department, under act of June 20, 1878.

Second. The number, amount, and the nature of the claims, and how much, if any, additional appropriation is necessary to pay and adjust all legal claims now on file.

Third. If anything has been found due to contractors of the late board of public works who have not paid and are still indebted to their laborers.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the adoption of the resolution, but have no objection to its reference.

Mr. BLISS. It is simply a resolution of inquiry, and I am sure if the gentleman understood it he would not object to it.

Mr. CONGER. Is it a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. BLISS. That is all.

Mr. CONGER. Then I will not object.

The resolution was agreed to.

JOHN T. PENNINGTON.

Mr. GLOVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6133) granting a pension to John T. Pennington, of Adair County, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that does not come under the rule which authorizes the gentleman to report at any time.

Mr. BALLOU. The object of the bill is simply to change the law in relation to binding, so as to have the series made uniform.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection to its consideration if no member of the House has. The bill will be read.

The bill provides that the act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, shall be amended by adding to the clause relating to the binding of books for the Departments of the Government, after the words "Congressional Library," the words "nor to the library of the Surgeon-General's Office."

Mr. BALLOU. The object of this bill is to provide that the series of books in the Surgeon-General's Office shall be of uniform binding.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BALLOU moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Resolved, That he has left a record of honorable deeds and of duty well performed which might well excite the emulation of the best and wisest of his surviving colleagues.

Resolved, That we extend to his family the assurance of our heartfelt sympathy in their great bereavement.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask unanimous consent that Thursday evening next, at half past seven o'clock, be assigned for the consideration of a bill in which every American citizen is interested—a bill for the classification of mail matter and the fixing of the rates of postage thereon.

Mr. CONGER. No other business for that evening?

The SPEAKER. No business but that bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WADDELL moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY HEADQUARTERS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for consideration at this time calling for information in which the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Military Affairs are much interested.

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to send to this House a detailed statement of the names and number of persons, exclusive of laborers, who are employed under the Architect of the Capitol, what duties they perform, the State they are from, and the salary they receive per diem or month; also what State each of the engineers, gardeners, superintendents, and firemen in charge of the work on the Capitol grounds is from.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. CONKLING, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. DAVIS of Illinois.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. No. 4200) relating to the National Road in the State of Maryland, and to give consent of the United States to a certain act of the General Assembly of Maryland in relation to said road.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House for printing 8,000 copies of the eulogies in the Senate and House of Representatives upon Hon. J. E. Leonard, late member from the fifth district of Louisiana.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT IN WISCONSIN, ETC.

Mr. POUND, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House such official reports and correspondence as have been received by him subsequent to the submission of his last annual report as relates to the improvement of the Chippewa River in Wisconsin and the Saint Croix River in Wisconsin and Minnesota, and such as relate to the examination and survey of the headwaters of the Mississippi, Saint Croix, Chippewa, and Wisconsin Rivers, to determine the practicability of creating reservoirs to regulate the volume and improve the navigation of said rivers.

MANUAL LABOR ASSOCIATION.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to present the petition of a number of very respectable colored men who desire to have their petition spread upon the record. It is brief, and I hope there will be no objection to printing it in the RECORD without the signatures.

There being no objection, the petition of N. M. Mitchell and others, of the Manual Labor Orphans' Relief School and National Industrial Arts Association, for an act of incorporation and for material aid in establishing institutions of the above title in certain States, was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The petition is as follows:

Petition of Noah Madison Mitchell and others, of the Manual Labor Orphans' Relief School and National Industrial Arts Association, praying for an act of incorporation and material aid in establishing institutions of the above title in certain States to encourage education and industry among the colored race, and for other purposes; accompanied with certificates from the governors of States, mayors and other officials of cities and towns, ministers of churches, principals of public schools, academies, and colleges, judges, members of the bar associations, bankers, and business men of all classes, approving the enterprise and commending it as one of national utility and worthy of national favor and material aid.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned petitioners, believing that the welfare of the nation and the peace, prosperity, and happiness of our common country depend upon the intellectual, moral, and industrial training of the people who are to constitute the future subjects as well as administrators of government; and

Whereas a large surplus of children of both sexes and races, and especially those whom we have the honor in part to represent belonging to the emancipated race, many of whose parents are suffering from old age and infirmity, and some of whom among your petitioners have lost the results of their most prosperous years of earnings since emancipation by the fall of the Freedmen's National Savings-Bank, thereby greatly discouraging them in their efforts toward moral, social, and intellectual elevation, and leaving their children destitute both of facilities and incentives to such educational improvement as is essential to good citizenship, and therefore an easy prey to ignorance, idleness, vagrancy, and crime; and believing the relief of such a class and the removal of such tendency to vice and consequent danger to the future peace, prosperity, and happiness of the Republic to be a work commended of God and approved by all good men, have organized a Manual Labor and Orphans' Relief School and National Industrial Arts Association for the improvement of the moral, mental, social, and industrial condition of the colored people of the United States of America.

It is proposed to teach our sons and daughters trades, mechanic arts, agriculture, household training, and like pursuits, as well as to instruct them in the common branches of an English education; thereby rendering them honest and useful citizens. And having procured lands and already begun the initial work with great certainty of success, and having the favor of hundreds of the most earnest and intelligent people of the country both in church and state, we, the officers and members of said association therefore, upon the commendations of the many high characters of the land who bespeak for this cause your earnest and favorable consideration, pray your honorable bodies to adopt the following:

A bill to incorporate the Manual Labor Orphans' Relief School and National Industrial Arts Association of the United States of America.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Noah M. Mitchell, Lewis W. Brown, Thomas Hayward, John Baker, Henry Allen, Albert Caldwell, John H. Little, Peter M. Williams, William F. Smith, Dennis C. Curtis, and others, are hereby created, with their associates and successors, a body corporate and politic, with perpetual succession, under the name, style, and title of "The Manual Labor Orphans' Relief School and National Industrial Arts Association of the United States of America," and by that name may contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded with in their corporate name, may have and use a common seal, may alter and change the same at will, and by the name, style, and title aforesaid the said association shall have full power and authority to receive funds and donations, including lands and such effects as may be designed to promote the end for which the association is created.

SEC. 2. That the object of this incorporated association shall be the care of destitute colored people, especially unfortunate and destitute children of the colored race, and the instruction of such persons by teaching them trades, the mechanic arts, agriculture, household training, and like pursuits, as well as to instruct them in the common branches of an English education, thereby rendering them honest, frugal, industrious, and useful citizens.

SEC. 3. That the officers of the association shall be a president, vice-president, recording secretary, corresponding secretary, treasurer, and a board of managers or trustees of not less than five nor more than nine persons, to be elected under such rules and regulations as are prescribed by the constitution and by-laws of the association: Provided, That the election of said officers shall take place on the first Monday in January of each year.

SEC. 4. That the said officers shall perform all the duties usually appertaining to their respective offices in similar organizations and as prescribed by the constitution of the association; and they shall give bonds in such sums as shall be regarded reasonable and necessary for the faithful performance of their duty under the provisions of the constitution and by-laws of the association.

SEC. 5. That any person may become a member of the association upon the payment of $10 into the treasury thereof, to whom a certificate of membership, issued by the secretary, shall be given, in accordance with the provisions of the constitution. ALBERT V. CONWAY.

Mr. PUCKER, by unanimous consent, reported, from the Committee of Ways and Means, a bill (H. R. No. 6137) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to Albert V. Conway, substituted trustee for certain registered United States bonds redeemed or assigned by the Government upon forged assignments; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered now.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read; after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to Albert V. Conway, substituted trustee to John Vanzant, under and according to the will of James Vanzant, deceased, late of Washington City and District of Columbia, registered bonds of the United States, according to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, and at the rate of 4 per cent. interest thereon per annum, in lieu of the following certificates of registered bonds, redeemed or assigned upon forged assignments, to wit: No. 7406, act of March 3, 1865, and No. 26273, act of March 3, 1865, consols of 1865, each for $1,000, the property of said Albert V. Conway, trustee substituted in place of said John Vanzant: Provided, however, That it shall be stipulated in each of said certificates issued under this act that no interest shall accrue or be payable upon either of them until and except from the death of Mary A. Boyd, who is entitled to a beneficial interest in said original bonds for her life under the will of said James Vanzant, deceased; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to require satisfactory proof of the death of said Mary A. Boyd before paying any interest on said bonds issued under this act.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not want to object to this bill, but I think its form is objectionable, as it not only authorizes but directs the Secretary of the Treasury. If the words "and directed" are omitted I have no objection to the bill; otherwise I must object.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me a single moment I will state the circumstances of this case. These are bonds held by a trustee for certain parties under the will of James Vanzant. The Government issued bonds to the assignee named in forged assignments; but the rights of the original parties could not be divested by the Government issuing new bonds upon forged assignments. This bill merely gives to the original party the right to bonds under the refunding act at 4 per cent. interest instead of 5-20 bonds, which bear 6 per cent. interest.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand that perfectly; but my objection is that the bill leaves to the Secretary of the Treasury no discretion in the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. The word "authorized" will be enough.

Mr. TUCKER. Very well.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What becomes of the other bonds?

Mr. TUCKER. Why they have gone into the hands of the assignee named in the forged assignment, and the Government must lose them. When the Government has issued new bonds to a man on a forged assignment the right of the original party cannot be divested.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. But the bonds are all registered.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Then the Government can stop payment.

Mr. TUCKER. I will say to the gentleman that there is a precedent for this bill in a bill reported a year or two ago from the Committee of Ways and Means and passed by this House. There can be no question about the right of the original parties to have these bonds issued to them.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I do not controvert that, but as I understand, the other bonds which were issued to a party upon a fraudulent power of attorney or forged assignment are registered bonds; and there ought to be some provision prohibiting the Government from paying these bonds.

Mr. TUCKER. They have been redeemed by the Government. They are not outstanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] as the Chair understands, assents to the modification suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] striking out the words "and directed." The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of the bill as thus modified.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the amount of these bonds?

Mr. TUCKER. There are two bonds of $1,000 each.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN B. LUTE.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6138) for the relief of John B. Lute; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. THOMPSON, for five days;

To Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, for five days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. PHILLIPS, for ten days.

And then, on motion of Mr. MILLS, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4810) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, the information in that Department respecting an arrangement made between the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Lawrence University, at Appleton, Wisconsin, for the education of Indian children; which, on motion of Mr. HOWE, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

SUPPLY OF WATER ON CAPITOL HILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant, directing them to report to the Senate "what action by Congress, if any, is necessary to secure to the residents of Capitol Hill, and other elevated portions of the city of Washington, a proper supply of water," &c.

The Secretary proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. DORSEY. That is quite a long document, and I suggest, as it relates to a matter of much importance, that it be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be printed, but I should like to hear it read.

Mr. BECK. I hope it will be printed in the RECORD. The reading will take but a little further time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it read, as it is a question which affects so largely the city.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the communication, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 21, 1879.

SIR: In compliance with the following resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant, "That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to report to the Senate what action by Congress, if any, is necessary to secure to the residents of Capitol Hill, and other elevated portions of the city of Washington, a proper supply of water; what appropriation of money, if any, is required for this purpose; and to transmit to the Senate such facts relating thereto as they may deem important," the commissioners have the honor to report:

Numerous considerations enter into this question of water supply, to most of which anything more than brief mention would involve a length of report and degree of elaboration for which there is no time and probably no occasion. The commissioners are not prepared to state details, and so reported in their report to Congress at the opening of the present session.

Either of two measures for improving the water supply may be resorted to: first, increasing the amount brought to the city; second, repressive measures designed to control the waste of the supply already delivered.

To give more than crude estimates of cost, or of the amount of labor and time involved in carrying into execution any plan for an increase of supply that Congress might adopt, would call for extended examinations by competent engineers.

There are two methods of increasing supply: first, to lay an additional main from the distributing reservoir; second, to extend the conduit to the high lands north of the city.

The cost of the main and proper distributing connections would be, say, $460,000. The extension of the conduit and additional reservoir would cost much more, but would bring a permanent supply to the immediate vicinity of the city.

The first consideration presenting itself with a question of this nature is the financial condition and ability of the water department itself, which, under the present rate of water rents, has a yearly income of about $94,500, derived from a scale of rents which has remained unchanged from that originally established at the time of the introduction of Potomac water. The Legislative Assembly authorized the levy of a tax for distributing mains amounting to one and a quarter cents per square foot contained in each lot fronting upon the street in which such mains are laid, payable in five yearly installments. The same property can be taxed but once to pay for such mains. Of this tax there is now an uncollected balance of $112,284.82.

The department is burdened with a bonded debt of $423,000, bearing 7 per cent. interest, the interest and sinking fund together involving a yearly payment at this time of $44,610. The debt was created by authority of the Legislative Assembly, July 20, 1871, to pay for the thirty-six-inch main, which has now been laid about six years. Deducting the amount of interest and sinking fund there remains of water-rent receipts about $49,890 to pay all the expenses of the water department, including present payment of the greater part of the cost of distributing mains, and also all repairs and the cost of pumping water in Washington and Georgetown, &c.

The water-main taxes are largely delinquent and the revenues of the department are inadequate to meet current demands. It is therefore manifestly not in condition to enter into an expensive outlay for an additional main, to do which would involve a large increase of the bonded debt of the water department and an addition to present water rents much beyond what the commissioners have had in view.

The main, (not yet one-fifth paid for,) laid but six years since, has a capacity much larger than the combined capacity of both those in use prior to that time. Yet within six years the supply, then more than doubled, has again become inadequate, not by a doubling of the population, for that has not happened, but in larger part by increase in the lavish use and waste of water. Were an additional main now to be laid, it is evident from past experience that within five or six years we would find ourselves in the same difficulty. Another main would be required, and if laid the water debt would be increased a second time, some years even before the final payment of the debt now existing.

In addition to these facts is the further serious one that the mains now laid are becoming old and must within a limited time be replaced, involving an expense as great as their original cost. There has been no legislation in the past, as a wise policy would have dictated, to provide a fund to meet these recurring heavy outlays. The Legislative Assembly imposed upon the water department many burdens without making provision by change in the water rates to meet them. The commissioners now find it absolutely necessary to ask authority to do what was thus neglected. They are of opinion that the foregoing financial statement shows that the time has arrived to adopt rather a repressive system, and by controlling waste remove the necessity for increasing the supply. They consider this a wiser policy than to enter upon an increase of debt which will, it is thought, rather encourage a greater waste and a corresponding increase per capita in the future demand.

There are now pumped into the stand-pipe at the head of Sixteenth street two million gallons of water daily, or all the supply at present reaching the pumps. About fifteen hundred houses are attached to the pipe. At present the two million gallons does not afford a sufficient supply. Thus between two hundred and three hundred gallons (say eight barrels) per capita is daily consumed in that section, and the supply is inadequate to the demand. The best known authorities upon water supply estimate sixty gallons per capita as a liberal and ample allowance in a city. At this rate the stand-pipe would supply thirty-three thousand people with water. Such a waste is unreasonable, and not to be justified upon any theory of health, comfort, or utility. The commissioners know of but one way to prevent this waste, and that is by measurement of the water used. They propose to test this system first upon the high service, and do not doubt that then the stand-pipe will be found to amply supply the two districts of the city for which it was designed, namely, the northwest section and Capitol Hill.

It is contemplated to carry an additional supply to the pumps; and if the need arises additional pumps can be erected without large expenditures.

It will be thus seen that the commissioners favor the idea of checking the increasing tendency to waste, a tendency that experience shows to have been rapidly growing, to improve the present distribution of water within the city, and to husband the resources of the water department to enable it eventually, and when the actual need comes, to bring the conduit itself to the high grounds in the vicinity of the city, which is doubtless the best plan for the future increase of supply, but one that with its connections will involve an outlay probably of $1,000,000.

The commissioners propose to have examinations and estimates made with a view to inform Congress at its next session more fully and exactly in respect to the future water supply.

Besides the connection of Capitol Hill with the stand-pipe, the general service of that section and South Washington can be increased by running a twelve-inch main from the thirty-inch main on K street along Fifteenth street west to re-enforce the Pennsylvania avenue main, and from Fifteenth street below Pennsylvania avenue to Ohio avenue, and thence down Fourteenth street, along South B street, to connect with the twenty-inch main on that street from which South Washington draws its supply, now coming to it by a circuitous route. This will enable the department to cut off partially the twenty-inch main leading from the intersection of New Jersey avenue and North B street, which main is now relied upon for the South Washington supply. At the junction referred to on New Jersey avenue a twenty-inch main (see map herewith) leads up to the high grounds of East Washington for its supply. The thirty-inch and thirty-six-inch mains unite upon New Jersey avenue and extend in a single main along it to B street, where the two twenty-inch mains branch off as above stated.

It is proposed also to cut off certain low ground in the northwest section now drawing upon the stand-pipe.

The estimated amounts required for the various purposes indicated are as follows:

Twelve-inch main stand-pipe to Capitol Hill	$25,000
Twelve-inch main to re-enforce the Pennsylvania avenue main, &c	12,500
Six-inch main to cut off low ground, northwest section, from stand-pipe	2,500
Two thousand meters, complete and erected	20,000
Additional pumps	5,000
Additional supply of water and pumps	5,000
	70,000

The uncollected water-main taxes, amounting to $112,284.42, represent the amount advanced from the water rents to lay water mains which have not been refunded from the taxes for mains. In addition to this deficiency there are large demands for new mains which the commissioners are unable to lay, and the expense of the department is increased by the pumps for the stand-pipe. So that an augmentation of rents is necessary.

It is respectfully recommended that Congress authorize an advance of the above estimated amount required for the purposes set forth to be refunded from the water-main taxes.

The present water rents are based upon the width and height of houses, measurements that have no relation whatever to the consumption of water. A house sixteen feet wide of two stories pays $3. Those of greater width and height pay twenty-five cents per foot of additional width and $1 for each story, a finished basement being regarded as a story.

It is the purpose of the commissioners to fix rates dependent upon the use made of water in houses—in other words, that, as near as circumstances will allow, water-takers shall pay in proportion to what they get. For these reasons, and because of the need to increase the receipts of the water department, the commissioners ask that authority be given them to regulate the water rates.

The inclosed bill, as amended, is designed to cover the foregoing recommendations.

By order of the board.

S. L. PHELPS, President.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER,
President United States Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of W. T. Glenn and others, citizens of Fresno County, California, praying for an amendment to the timber-culture act so as to give title to those who will keep ten acres of trees growing for five years not more than sixteen feet apart each way; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the memorial of Fred. Litton and a large number of others, citizens of Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the bill reviving the patent granted to John C. Birdsell for improvement in combined clover-threshers and hullers, so called. As the bill is on the Calendar, I move that the memorial lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the memorial of John S. Long and others, citizens of New Berne, North Carolina, remonstrating against the removal of the Federal courts from that city to the city of Goldsborough, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Edward Haile, surviving partner of Haile & Savage, of Alabama, praying for the passage of a law referring his claim for compensation for certain cotton alleged to have been seized and appropriated by United States military authorities at Savannah, Georgia, in December, 1864, to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DORSEY presented the petition of William Forsyth, late surveyor of the District of Columbia, praying compensation for certain services rendered the District government while in that office; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL. By request of the Committee on Claims, I present a supplemental memorial in behalf of the heirs of the claimants of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, and I move that this supplemental memorial be printed for the use of the committee and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I presented a few days ago the petition of Landsford P. Yandell and wife, and others, sureties on the bond of Henry L. Norvell, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Tennessee, praying that they may be relieved from responsibility as such sureties; and it was referred to the Committee on Finance. I now present additional evidence in the case, and move its reference to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. I present the memorial of the Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends, signed by Henry Janney, clerk of that body, representing their concern on account of the evils of intemperance, and praying Congress, by appropriate legislation, to eradicate permanently this evil. Inasmuch as not only the evil of intemperance is to be grappled with in this inquiry, but a very important legal question, I think that it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee; and I therefore ask its reference to that committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to my friend that I think it is the Committee on Finance, which is supplied with plenty of judicial talent, which has had this subject for a session or two under consideration by very numerous petitions; and as the Committee on the Judiciary is, to use a western phrase, "swamped" with the number of subjects which have already been sent to it, I hope the Senator will consent that the memorial go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WHYTE. The only objection to it is that the petitions heretofore have been directed to the traffic in alcohol more particularly, rather than the moral question of temperance, to see whether it cannot be eradicated by some legislation; and therefore I think it is a very important inquiry for the Judiciary Committee to take charge of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend puts it upon moral grounds, I shall have to submit.

Mr. WHYTE. Precisely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to submit from the Committee on Public Lands a minority report in the matter of the claim of William McGarrahan. The majority report was presented and filed in my absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The minority views will be received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARLAND. When that order of business is reached I shall ask leave to introduce a bill to carry out the views of the minority report.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 716) for the relief of Huff Jones, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1676) to prevent and punish the counterfeiting within the United States of notes, bonds, or other securities of foreign governments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HEREFORD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1677) making an appropriation for the improvement of Big Sandy River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1678) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of New River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1679) making an appropriation for the improvement of Elk River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1680) making an appropriation for the improvement of Guyandotte River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1681) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1682) relating to the rank of certain retired Army officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1683) in relation to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in California; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 52) to correct an error in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of the extent of the present area of the Colville Indian Reservation in Washington Territory, with the boundaries thereof, the date when such reservation was established, and in what manner, whether by Executive order or act of Congress; also the number of Indians now occupying such reservation.

REFUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. No. 5808) to facilitate the refunding the national debt.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say that it has received the unanimous assent of the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in the process of refunding the national debt under existing laws, to exchange directly, at par, the bonds of the United States bearing interest at 4 per cent. per annum, authorized by law, for the bonds of the United States commonly known as five-twenties, outstanding and uncalled; and whenever they shall have been redeemed, the provisions of this section and all existing provisions of law authorizing the refunding of the national debt shall apply to any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum or a higher rate, which may be redeemable. In any exchange made under the provisions of this section interest may be allowed on the bonds redeemed for a period of three months.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, as I have already said, this bill has met the unanimous approval of the Committee on Finance. It simply provides that private parties may exchange their 5 and 6 per cent. bonds directly with the Treasury at par, and receive the interest for three months, the same as national banks and syndicates have done heretofore, which is a necessity under the existing provisions of positive law. I do not suppose there will be any objection in any quarter to having a bill of this kind for the promotion of the exchange of a bond bearing a higher rate of interest for one of a lower rate of interest. The object is to facilitate the popular loan.

Mr. CONKLING. What does the conclusion of the bill mean, if the Senator will state? It provides that—

In any exchange made under the provisions of this section, interest may be allowed, on the bonds redeemed, for a period of three months.

Mr. MORRILL. It means to follow simply the practice of the Treasury ever since any loans have been refunded, for the last ten years.

Mr. CONKLING. What is that practice, may I inquire?

Mr. MORRILL. The practice is that bonds must be called in advance of their payment, and an interest of three months has been allowed in all cases except one. There was one loan, I think, under Secretary Bristow, that was negotiated at par; but at that time the loan itself, that is the bonds, were worth at least from 1½ to 2½ per cent. premium. This bill will effect the same thing; or it permits an exchange at par with the loss of three months' interest.

Mr. CONKLING. This is an allowance of 1½ per cent.?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes; 1½ on six percents and 1¼ on five percents.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The business of the morning hour is concluded, and the Senate will resume the consideration of the bill (S. No. 720) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment, under the resolution for the consideration of the general Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that that bill may be passed over for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection; and the Secretary will report the next business on the Calendar.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 47) authorizing Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] objected to that joint resolution the other day, and I ask that it lie over until he returns to the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over without prejudice; and the next business on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same may be said of the next joint resolution on the Calendar. It is of a class to which the Senator from California has objected hitherto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be passed over, and the next bill on the Calendar reported.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 777) to organize a life-saving and coast-guard service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. SARGENT,] who reported this bill, it will be passed over without prejudice; and the next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 195) to declare certain lands subject to taxation. It provides that all the lands granted by the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, to the several railroad companies therein named, and to which the companies would have become entitled upon payment of the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same, as provided by section 21 of the amendatory act of July 2, 1864, shall be subject to all legal taxes imposed under authority of any State or Territory in which such lands are located, to the same extent as they would have been had such costs been paid and the lands conveyed to the railroad companies. But this is not to be construed as applying to lands already forfeited by the railroad companies, or either of them; nor shall it operate to relieve any such company from any forfeiture heretofore incurred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill was before the Senate, April 18, 1878, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was agreed to, adding a proviso.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read. It is a very important subject as respects the rights of the United States, and we ought to go a little slowly about this business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BOOTH, February 25, 1878:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 195) to declare certain lands subject to taxation, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

An act of Congress of July 1, 1862 (vol. 12, p. 492, Statutes at Large,) granted to the railroad companies therein named five alternate sections per mile on each side of their respective roads.

An amendatory act of July 2, 1864 (vol. 13, p. 358, Statutes at Large,) doubled the grant of lands, but required the companies to pay the cost of surveying before receiving patents for the lands.

It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that these lands are not subject to taxation until the cost of surveying, selecting, and locating are paid.

The railroad companies under this law, by declining to pay these costs, hold large bodies of their lands free from local taxation, converting what was intended as a burden into a benefit.

The companies can and do mortgage their lands, sell them, and exercise absolute ownership over them, but they are exempt from taxes. In many instances they have sold them with the stipulation that the payment of the cost of survey should be deferred, that the purchaser may hold and improve them without liability for the taxes to which all other similar property is subjected. This bill is designed to remedy this injustice, and the committee recommend its passage with an amendment.

The following table exhibits the amount of lands granted and the amount patented or certified to the respective companies:

Name of road.	Estimated quantity embraced in the grant.	Number of acres certified or patented up to June 30, 1877.
Union Pacific	12,000,000.00	1,857,792.12
Kansas Pacific	6,000,000.00	531,261.71
Central Pacific	9,100,000.00	1,116,757.17
Burlington and Missouri River	2,441,600.00	2,374,090.77
Sioux City and Pacific	60,000.00	40,678.23

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are two or three questions, Mr. President, that naturally arise about this bill, to which the notice of the Senate ought to be called; and I refer to it particularly from the circumstance that the Committee on the Judiciary in exploring the subject, when it had under consideration what is known as the Thurman bill which was enacted into a law, had its attention drawn to the condition of these lands. I think there cannot be much doubt that the companies ought to be compelled to take their patents where they have become entitled to them, and when they do, all responsibility on the part of the United States as a public body toward the States and Territories will have been discharged and the lands will be subject to taxation, as other lands are, undoubtedly, unless the statutory mortgage of the United States upon these lands, the condition of their sale, should have been broken, which would produce a forfeiture.

I should be sorry to have the Senate led into taking a step which is going to cost hereafter; but it is open to some question inasmuch as these lands now are not taxable by law, being legally the property of the United States; and inasmuch as the United States has by statute authorized a pledge of the lands while still the property of the United States, if we provide by an affirmative act, as the bill provides, that they shall be subject to taxation under the authority of the States and Territories, and they should be sold for these taxes as against the railway and its first mortgages, whether we shall not have a claim presented to Congress by and by upon the part of the people who held a right under the statutes of the United States to these lands free from taxation to make good to them the lands that have been lost from under their security by force of this affirmative and direct tax act of the United States. I do not express any opinion as to what the law would turn out to be; I only say that there is considerable danger of our getting into a difficulty upon that subject.

Then, in the next place, as everybody knows, the United States has a lien upon these lands; and as long as the lands are in the United States, so far as the title goes, of course that lien is perfect, subject to the right of the prior mortgagee. When the lands are disposed of in pursuance of the mortgage, then there is a trust which follows the proceeds of the lands into the proper assets of the companies, so that the United States and the prior mortgagee are secured on the money in the place of the lands.

It is said, and it is not at all clear that it is not true, that the United States need every acre of these lands and every dollar of money that is to come from them to be applied to the payment of the prior mortgage and of the enormous mortgage, so to call it, that the United States has. Everybody remembers that no interest is paid to us upon these advances of bonds of the United States. The United States pays the interest all the time. The companies do not return it; and the Supreme Court has decided that the companies, as the law then stood, were not bound to return the interest until at least the end of the time when the payment of the principal would be due, and it is left an open question perhaps whether they are bound to return it then. In that way there is running up continually an augmentation to a tremendous amount of the interest of the United States in all this property of these companies.

Now, if we provide by statute that these lands, although not patented though they ought to be perhaps, shall be subject to State and territorial taxation as well, the result will be that a considerable part of these lands will be disposed of for taxation, and the title and security of the United States will be gone unless we make a provision by law authorizing some Department of the Government, an authority that probably no Department now possesses, to pay the taxes and so redeem the lands.

It is a pretty grave question whether, when its own interests are so largely involved in these lands which it now has the legal title to, the United States owes any duty by comity or good morals or friendship or justice, any kind of a duty to the States and Territories in which these lands lie in respect of subjecting them to burdens, when the real interest of the United States for its own security is greater than the whole value of the lands themselves. In that state of the case, I should considerably prefer that this bill should not be acted upon in a hurry, for it ought to be very carefully considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It goes over under objection.

Mr. BOOTH. Do I understand the Senator to make an argument against the bill and then object to its consideration?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to its consideration at this moment.

Mr. BOOTH. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object at this moment to the consideration of the bill. My friend from California no doubt would desire to be heard.

Mr. BOOTH. It is not my bill, although I reported it, and I have no personal desire to be heard. There is no doubt, Mr. President, that there is a palpable wrong and the only question in my mind is how the remedy shall be applied. This bill does not by any means render the whole of the land grants to these railroads taxable. It applies to a very small portion of them, only to such lands as the United States Government has paid the cost of surveying, and for which the railroad companies refuse to take patents. Under the provisions of the law, if I understand it rightly, no further surveys will be made of these lands until these payments have been made by the railroad companies for surveys already perfected.

The first decision of the Supreme Court that held these lands were exempt from taxation was in the case of the Railway Company vs. Prescott, 16 Wallace, 603. It was there held that the lands sold by the United States may be taxed before patents have issued, but not until the right to a patent is completed, and that the right of the railroad company is not completed until the costs of surveying, selecting, and locating are paid.

Now, I understand the Senator from Vermont to say that it would be good legislation to compel them to take their patents; but you cannot compel them to take their patents until they choose to make payment of the costs of the survey, and this they decline to do for the reason that these lands may be held exempt from taxes; and, as is stated in the report, they have sold very many valuable lands which have passed into the hands of their assignees; improvements have been made upon them, the railroad companies simply giving bonds to perfect the title, so that these improved lands are held exempt from State taxation.

I think a practical wrong of this kind ought to be remedied, even if the far-seeing Senator from Vermont can see some possible, remote, contingent, improbable injury that may arise to the General Government. None such will arise to bear any comparison to the evils the States are suffering, even if the honorable Senator supposes there ought to be no comity and no obligation on the part of the United States Government to do justice to the States.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to say a word. The United States, in reserving to itself the legal title to these lands until the cost of surveying should be paid, certainly had no intention whatever, or if it had, that intention was not expressed by the statute, thereby to exempt the lands from taxation. No such purpose was manifest. It not only did not intend to reserve them from taxation, but it did not intend to prevent their being sold, whereby it might, as the Senator from Vermont seems to indicate, retain the lien for the money which it had advanced to build the railroad. That is quite manifest from the fact that the Government stipulated with the railroad companies that the railroad companies should sell the lands within three years of the time when they completed their roads. Therefore it did not intend to hinder the railroad companies from disposing of the lands, and by such disposition defeat the lien of the Government, but it intended to impose it on them as an obligation to sell the lands, and that is stated specifically by the court in the decision of Railway Company vs. Prescott. At page 609 of 16 Wallace the court say:

> It is wisely provided that these lands shall not be used by the company as a monopoly of indefinite duration.

This undoubtedly, whatever the covert intention of the framers of the bill might have been, shows an intention on the part of the Government simply so to reserve to itself the right of receiving the cost of surveying these lands. Now, under the shelter of that section the railroad companies, as is stated by the Senator from California, sell the land on ten, twelve, or perhaps fifteen years' time, giving a bond for a deed, and do not pay the cost of surveying, and do not take out a patent, whereby these lands not only become untaxable at present, but that quality of not being taxed pertains to them during all this long period of time, and some of the most valuable tracts of land in the State which I in part represent are to-day, as they have been for many years, exempt from taxation under this rule.

The title of the General Government is simply a naked legal title, without any beneficial interest except to the extent of about $3 to a quarter section which it reserves to itself the right to compel the railroad company to pay before it parts with that legal title. That is the only beneficial interest the Government has. For the purpose, then, of obtaining that $3 to a quarter section, it imposes upon the several States and Territories in which these lands lie an annual burden amounting to many times that upon each quarter section of land by reason of this exemption from taxation. I claim with the Senator from California, as I think every person must admit who has had this subject under consideration, that that is not only unjust, but was entirely without the purview of the intention of Congress in reserving to itself this right to receive this amount of money, to wit: the cost of survey.

The fact is, besides, as to the possible interest the Government may have in these lands, that they are mortgaged for all they are worth. That is evident from the fact that they have not only had a first mortgage put upon them as a rule, but also a second mortgage, and those second-mortgage bonds are selling in the market for very much less than their par value, which would not be the case if the lands were of sufficient value, known and recognized as being of sufficient value to take up and discharge the mortgage. That is not the case. They are mortgaged for more than they are worth. This mortgage title or claim is a title which the Government has permitted to be made upon these lands. If the mortgagees do not want to have the lands on which they hold this lien go to sale, then it is within their power, under the statute, to pay the taxes and thereby add to the lien they already have the amount thus paid for taxes, and that is what they ought to be compelled to do.

I do not think there can be any possible ground for saying that the Government of the United States reserved or intended to reserve any interest in this matter for the benefit of the persons who might hold the mortgage, so that they might come back at some future day and say we had placed a burden on their property which we were obliged to respond to in damages. There could not be any purpose of that kind. The whole purpose apparent on the face of the statute was that the Government should have a right to receive the two three or four dollars a quarter section which it cost to survey the lands, and there was no other purpose; but under the shelter of that the railroad companies decline to take out the title and thus defeat the taxation of the lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Vermont to object to the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dislike very much to object, but at the same time in any aspect of the case this bill ought to be amended to protect the interest of the United States, so far as that is a direct money interest, at the very least. Now Senators say that this bill only applies to lands that the railroad companies have got a title to except that they have not paid the cost of surveying, but in all other respects the title of the railway has become perfect; the railway does not pay the cost of surveying, which is the only step left to entitle them to the land. I am very much afraid that the first branch of this bill on reading it over again, does not stand in such a way as to limit the operation of the act to that class of land. It says that all the lands granted by the act of July 1, 1862, and the act of July 2, 1864, "to which said companies would have become entitled upon payment of the cost of surveying," &c. Now all the lands granted they would have become entitled to on paying the cost of surveying. The grant was a complete one upon the building of the road, which has been done.

Mr. BOOTH. How could they become liable for the cost of the surveys before the surveys were made?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most plainly they could not; but that is the language. The bill says "all the lands granted that the companies would have become entitled to upon payment." It seems to me at first blush that there is not a single acre of the land granted on the first day that the act passed that the companies would have become entitled to on the payment of the cost of survey and the building of the road, which has been completed. So there may be under that language a large mass of unsurveyed lands that would fall within the scope of this act, on account of the insufficiency of the exclusion of that class of lands. Some words can be found undoubtedly that will exclude them and yet meet the purpose.

Then I think also that it is plain—(and in that I feel sure the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from California will agree with me)—that if the States wished to sell these lands for taxes they ought to pay the cost of the survey that the railroad ought to have paid. It is very easy to fix that by inserting after the word "shall" in line 14 the words—

> After payment to the United States of all such costs—

That is the cost of surveying named before—> be subject to all legal taxes.

So that the State and territorial authorities can go and pay the cost of surveying, and then dispose of the land for taxes. That it is easy enough to make secure; but the descriptive part of this bill, I submit, with great respect to my honorable friends, is liable to a construction which will carry it over quite a larger area and class of lands than the Senators intend to have it go. I should be glad to have it laid aside for a few moments without prejudice until I shall suggest the necessary amendments. I dislike to object to a bill after discussing it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over without prejudice. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

P. P. G. HALL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 420) for the relief of Major P. P. G. Hall; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SPENCER on the 28th of February, 1878:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred S. No. 420, "A bill for the relief of Major P. P. G. Hall," have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

This is a bill directing the refundment to Major P. P. G. Hall, a paymaster in the Army, the sum of $3,141.39, being the amount paid by him into the Treasury, January 15, 1872, in liquidation of a deficiency in his accounts as paymaster, caused by the criminal acts of a clerk named James Thomas, occurring in 1869, and of which said Thomas was duly convicted.

This matter was thoroughly investigated by the committee of the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and a favorable report, accompanied by a bill for relief, made to the Senate. (See Report No. 604, second session, Forty-fourth Congress, January 23, 1877.) The bill was not reached before the final adjournment of the Forty-fourth Congress, and now comes up by identical bill. Inasmuch as the facts and record are the same as those submitted to the consideration of the committee heretofore, your committee adopt the report of the previous committee, as hereinafter set forth, and recommend passage of the bill.

"[Forty-fourth Congress, second session, Senate Report No. 604.]

"Mr. SPENCER submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. No. 1175:

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Major Peter P. G. Hall, praying to have refunded certain money he was obliged to pay in consequence of the embezzlement of a clerk, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

"The record shows that the petitioner, a paymaster in the Army of the United States, was stationed in the years 1868 and 1869 at Vicksburgh and Jackson, in the State of Mississippi, where, in addition to his duties of payments to the officers and soldiers of the Army stationed in the various parts of the military district, and which required him to travel over parts of the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Alabama to perform the same, he was also charged with the arduous and responsible payment of what is known as "reconstruction vouchers," the funds of which were separate from those furnished for the payment of the Army.

"The additional duty imposed upon the petitioner a vast amount of labor, in the performance of which, in addition to his regular clerk, he was allowed by the proper authorities other clerks, and also enlisted men, from time to time, as occasion required, to the number of fifteen or twenty, for the purpose of assisting in the work of preparing for payment the said reconstruction accounts. Among the number of clerks so employed to meet the exigencies of this extra service was one James Thomas.

"The said James Thomas, while thus employed as a clerk, and engaged in the preparation of the vouchers on which said reconstruction accounts were paid, at various times between March 1, 1868, and February 1, 1869, without petitioner's knowledge, fraudulently and feloniously altered a large number of reconstruction vouchers which had been approved and ordered paid by the proper military authorities, so as to largely increase the amount of money due on the same, and raised and altered checks signed by the petitioner for their payment, by means of which felonious practices he obtained the money on said vouchers and checks, and embezzled of the money of the United States the sum of $3,409.62 before he was detected thereof.

"During this period the petitioner was engaged in the discharge of his regular duties of paymaster, which necessarily called him frequently away from his headquarters into various parts of the military district where troops were stationed, and he therefore had no knowledge of the frauds committed by said Thomas until they were discovered by the accounting officers of the Treasury. Upon the discovery of these facts, the said Thomas was, at the request of the petitioner, immediately arrested by order of General A. C. Gillem, commanding the military district, and on the 19th of October, 1869, he was arraigned before a general court-martial convened at Jackson, Mississippi, by order of General Ames, the department commander, charged with the following crimes:

"First. Making claims against the Government of the United States, knowing the same to be fictitious and fraudulent, in violation of the act of Congress of March 2, 1863.

"Second. Making and using false vouchers, knowing the same to contain false and fraudulent statements and entries, for the purpose of obtaining the approval of false claims, in violation of the same act.

"Third. Knowingly and willfully appropriating to his own use money belonging to the United States, in violation of the same act.

"Fourth. Conduct to the prejudice of good order and discipline.

"On the 28th of January, 1870, after a full investigation by the court-martial convened for that purpose, the said Thomas was declared guilty upon all the charges, and sentenced to forfeit to the United States all pay then due or that may become due, to pay a fine of $3,299.01, and to be confined at hard labor for the period of five years; which proceedings were approved by General Ames, and the said Thomas was incarcerated in the penitentiary at Jackson, Mississippi.

"In consequence of this embezzlement, there was found to be due, upon settlement of petitioner's accounts by the proper officers of the Government, a deficiency of $3,141.39, which amount was made a charge against him. Thereupon the petitioner was suspended from duty and pay until he should pay over and reimburse to the Government the amount of said deficit, a refusal to comply with the same rendering liable to be court-martialed and dismissed the service as a defaulter. Accordingly the petitioner did pay over to the United States the said sum of $3,141.39, the amount of the moneys so embezzled by the said Thomas.

"After the said payment and liquidation by said petitioner of the amount so charged against him, he filed, on the 29th of October, 1873, his petition for relief in the Court of Claims, under the act of May 9, 1866, by which said court is invested with jurisdiction to grant relief in cases of this character; and whenever said court shall have ascertained the facts of any such loss to have been without fault or neglect on the part of the officer suffering a loss of the public funds, it is provided by said act that a decree shall be made, setting forth the amount thereof, upon which the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall allow to such officer the amount so decreed as a credit in the settlement of his accounts.

"On demurrer to the said petition, the Court of Claims held 'that petitioner could not recover, for the reason that his liability for the defalcation had been discharged by the payment of the money. The court held that an officer entitled to the relief contemplated by the act must not only have been, but must still be, held responsible to the Government for that which is lost. "If the responsibility has been discharged, he is no longer entitled to relief. His account has by his own act been settled and closed, and there is therefore no unsettled account upon which a credit decreed by this court could be allowed.'

"Therefore the petitioner was denied the relief he sought, because he had under the orders of his superiors previously paid over the deficit charged against him. The record shows that the petitioner had no time to present his case to the Court of Claims previously to the payment of the deficit. Although petitioner made application for delay for the purpose of endeavoring to obtain relief, the record shows such delay was peremptorily refused, and by Special Order No. 139 of the War Department, dated August 4, 1870, which was issued immediately upon settlement of his account by the Second Auditor of the Treasury, the petitioner was ordered to repair without delay for duty in the Department of Texas. It also appears in the record that, by letter of the Adjutant-General of date August 16, 1870, petitioner's request for delay was denied, and the order to proceed at once to Texas was reiterated.

"A letter from the then Paymaster-General is in the record, from which it appears that officer, in suspending petitioner and threatening him with court-martial unless he paid over the deficit, disclaims all intention of barring petitioner from his legal remedy in the Court of Claims. But it is proper to remark, the effect of the Paymaster-General's acts was to debar petitioner, and therefore to force him to seek congressional relief. Had the exigencies of the public service and the consideration of his superior officers so permitted, there can be no reasonable doubt he would have been relieved by the Court of Claims under the broad and equitable provisions of the act of May 9, 1866, had he not in obedience to orders previously paid the amount of the deficit so charged against him.

"Hon. E. B. French, Second Auditor of the Treasury, and the officer charged with the settlement of paymasters' accounts, certifies 'that, with the exception of the reconstruction accounts, wherein fraud was alleged to have been committed by a clerk, the petitioner's accounts have been rendered in an acceptable and satisfactory manner, and his payments appear to have been made with care and ability.'

"Thus far the case presents unquestionable merit, and the remaining point for consideration is, whether the petitioner had exercised proper care and caution and such reasonable prudence as is required of a disbursing officer. The Secretary of War, being addressed on this subject, submits the following report:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"Washington City, January 22, 1877.

"SIR: Returning your letter of the 19th instant, requesting information in the matter of defalcation of Major P. P. G. Hall, paymaster, United States Army, through his clerk, James Thomas, I have the honor to invite your attention to the report of the Paymaster-General, dated the 20th instant, (indorsed on your letter,) and accompanying papers.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"J. D. CAMERON,
"Secretary of War.

"Hon. GEORGE E. SPENCER,
"Of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

"UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
"Washington, January 19, 1877.

"SIR: Referring to the petition of Major P. P. G. Hall, paymaster, United States Army, praying to be reimbursed on account of certain defalcations occurring through the criminality of a clerk named James Thomas, while said petitioner was charged with the duties of paying vouchers under the reconstruction act, which petition is now pending before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, I have the honor to request such information as may be within the province of the War Department to afford, touching the question whether Major Hall exercised, under the attendant circumstances, such care and due diligence as a disbursing officer as would be reasonably and justly required by the precedents and practice of the Department. As the committee desire to determine this case on Tuesday next, please direct an early reply.

"Very respectfully,

"GEO. E. SPENCER,
"Of Senate Committee on Military Affairs, Acting Chairman.

"Hon. J. D. CAMERON,

"Respectfully referred to the Paymaster-General for report.

"Chief Clerk.

"January 19, 1877.

"Respectfully returned to the Hon. Secretary of War.

"As these transactions occurred several years before I arrived here, I have to make a statement derived from a variety of sources, mostly from the records of this office. These embezzlements by James Thomas, clerk to Major P. P. G. Hall, occurred when he was stationed at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, from September, 1868, to February 1, 1869, from funds on "reconstruction account" deposited with the assistant treasurer at New Orleans. The vouchers were paid by check on that depository, printed as payable to "bearer." It was customary to pay them (after the approval of each voucher by Brigadier-General Ord, commanding the fourth military district) by checks to the order of the claimant. Thus the word bearer on the check was erased, and the word order substituted. It appears that Thomas would write the word order on the check by a black-lead pencil when presented to Major Hall, who has the misfortune to be near-sighted, which facilitated the crime of the offender. With a rubber he would erase the pencil-marks, and thus as the check would become payable to bearer he was able to appropriate the money to his own use. As no complaint of non-payment ever reached this office, Thomas must have first passed to Major Hall a correct voucher, duly countersigned by General Ord, and obtained a correct check to the order of the claimant, which was sent to him. Afterward he would alter and raise the amount of the voucher and present a new check for the increased amount, as he performd the duty of preparing the voucher and the check necessary to pay it.

"When these vouchers were critically examined in this office, these alterations became apparent, and were disallowed.

"A careful overhauling in this office, and afterward in the office of the Second Auditor, led to a disallowance in this manner amounting to $3,141.39. This amount was made good by Major Hall, being deposited with the United States depositary at San Antonio, Texas.

"I do not doubt that Major Hall, as stated in his report on the subject of the 19th instant, addressed to this office, was in the habit of comparing carefully the total amount of the voucher with the amount of the check before signing the latter—his near-sightedness, as in case of the check, rendering less obvious to him than to most disbursing officers the changes and alterations of the vouchers. He had severe work imposed upon him at Vicksburgh, being required to make these reconstruction disbursements in addition to his ordinary duty of paying the troops. His disbursements on the latter account, during the five months from September, 1868, to January, 1869, were $185,623.97; on account of reconstruction, $79,445.60.

"The vouchers (true amount) were often small, varying from $10 up to $60, and a few over $100.

"The general reputation of Major Hall for industry, fidelity, and accuracy of his accounts has been very good; and he appears to have made these disbursements at a time when extraordinary labor was imposed upon him.

"I inclose herewith Major Hall's letter of 19th instant, and copy of General Order No. 4, of February 5, 1870, from headquarters military district, by which it will be seen that James Thomas was tried by a general court-martial, found guilty, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment for the offense, and to pay a fine of $3,299.01.

"I also inclose a statement of Major T. F. Barr, judge-advocate of said court-martial, whose duty it was to thoroughly investigate the case, and who expresses an opinion favorable to the present claim of Major Hall.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., January 17, 1877.

"SIR: I am a petitioner to Congress for reimbursement in the matter of the embezzlement of Thomas, my clerk. As you prosecuted this case on behalf of the United States Government, and are conversant with it, will you be so kind as to favor me with your views, based on your knowledge of the case, regarding the manner in which my business was transacted, and if there was the necessary care and diligence exercised on my part.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"P. P. G. HALL,
"Paymaster, United States Army.

"Col. THOMAS F. BARR,
"Judge-Advocate, U. S. A.

[Indorsement.]

"WASHINGTON, January 17, 1877.

"Respectfully returned, through the Secretary of War.

"In the spring of 1869 I was ordered by the Secretary of War to proceed to Jackson, Mississippi, in response to a telegram received from General Ames asking for a judge-advocate to prosecute a case of embezzlement.

"Upon arriving at Jackson, I found that a Mr. Thomas, clerk to Major P. P. G. Hall, paymaster, was in the guard-house in Vicksburgh, charged with embezzlement of public funds, and that a writ of habeas corpus had issued from the United States district court (Judge Hill) for his release.

"I made an investigation of the case and satisfied myself of the man's guilt, and then made a return to the writ, and argued the case successfully, the petitioner being remanded to military custody. He was subsequently tried by military court for embezzlement of public funds, and sent to the penitentiary for a term of years.

"I could not at the time conceive that Major Hall would be held responsible for the money embezzled by Thomas. With the arduous duties imposed on him in the administration of the reconstruction laws, in addition to his regular official labors, the administration of his office appeared to me commendable in every way.

"That he should have been held pecuniarily responsible for the criminal act of a subordinate has ever appeared to me a great injustice.

"THOMAS F. BARR,
"Judge-Advocate, United States Army.

"From these reports it appears that petitioner exercised such reasonable prudence and diligence as could be fairly required under the circumstances, and that the defalcation of Thomas was not owing to any want of care or diligence on the part of the petitioner.

"Your committee also believe that where public funds have been lost by disbursing officers by robbery, accident, or the default of subordinates, without any fault or want of care on their part, it has been customary not to hold such officers liable for the sums thus lost, or, in cases where the money has been paid into the Treasury, as in the case of this memorialist, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the same. Believing that this case comes within the principle established by the precedents referred to, your committee report herewith an act for the relief of the memorialist."

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause of the bill and inserting:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow and pay to Major P. P. G. Hall, of the United States Army, such sums as they may deem just and equitable, not to exceed the sum of $3,141.39, on account of a former deficiency in his accounts as paymaster, caused by the criminal acts of his clerk, James Thomas, in 1868 and 1869, and of which the said clerk was duly convicted.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no objection that I know of to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand the principle on which the bill is recommended by the committee is that the clerk was not selected by the officer but was assigned to him. It was the clerk's default and he was punished therefor. On that principle I am willing the bill should pass without objection, if that is the ground on which it is based.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from California is correct about that. This officer was assigned to pay the reconstruction accounts in Mississippi, and this clerk was detailed to do that work.

Mr. SARGENT. Were this otherwise, had the officer the selection of his clerk, for fear that collusion might spring up between a bad officer and a bad clerk, I should be opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. On the principle stated by the Senator from California the committee recommended the bill. The clerk was not selected by the officer, but was a detailed clerk and he had to take him.

The bill was passed.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREYS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 819) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffreys.

Mr. McMILLAN. Let the report be read in that case.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, on the 27th of February, 1878.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I must object to that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I ask to have taken up the bill that was passed by at my request.

Mr. BECK. I did not hear what the Senator from Vermont said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He objected to the consideration of the Jeffreys bill.

Mr. BECK. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that it is only a question of amount. All agree that something ought to be paid. There was no war at the place where the property was taken. The Forty-third Congress passed a bill for $5,000, both Houses agreeing, and there is now no question except whether she shall have $800 or $5,000. That is all there is in the case.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no question in my mind that she is entitled to $5,000, and I examined it carefully.

Mr. BECK. So I supposed. It is only a question of the amount that ought to be paid. If the bill be passed over now, this lady will have no chance at this Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Forty-third Congress was I believe a republican Congress, and we ought to look with a little care to the acts it passed. I will look at this bill with the Senator's permission.

In justice to Senators who had up a previous bill they ought to have their bill considered as it was laid aside for the moment.

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to that, but I do not want it to lose its place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want it to lose its place. It may be considered as a bill on the Calendar. I want the bill in regard to taxing lands taken up.

PACIFIC RAILROAD LANDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 195) to declare certain lands subject to taxation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend by inserting after "named," in line 10, the words "which have been surveyed," and in the same line striking out "would," and in line 11, after the word "entitled," inserting "to patents;" so as to read:

Which have been surveyed and for which said companies have become entitled to patents upon payment of the cost of surveying, selecting, and locating the same, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move further to amend by inserting in line 14, after the word "shall," the words "after payment to the United States of all such costs by or under the authority of such State or Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to make an inquiry. As I am informed, whatever title is or ever was in the railroad corporations to the lands granted by the United States is covered by the two mortgages. Am I right? If that be so, then it seems to me there is great danger that the United States, to protect itself under its large mortgage, which is the second one, if the railroad companies do not pay the taxes, will have to pay them. There will be, therefore, lands here which the States and Territories will tax, and the taxes will not be paid, and the Federal Government will have to pay them to protect its mortgage, which really covers all this property. It seems to me a mode of having the money run from the United States Treasury into the State treasuries, because the railroad companies and the first mortgagees may not pay the taxes, and then the United States will have to pay them. I may be wrong in the facts; but if not, the suggestion I make is entitled to consideration.

Mr. BOOTH. Does the Senator from New York contend that because there is a mortgage on land in favor of the United States, or anybody else, that land ought to be exempt from taxation? The decision of the Supreme Court is expressly on the ground that this lien is reserved, not for the benefit of the mortgagee, but to compel the railroad companies to pay the costs of survey, which do not amount on an average to six cents an acre, and in the two decisions of the Supreme Court not a single reference is made to the lien held by the Government or by any other mortgagee.

Now is it to be asserted here that because the Government of the United States holds a lien on land which may at some remote day be of value, the land shall be made exempt from taxation? As a matter of fact that lien has no real value. The lands are sold by the railroad companies under the terms of the act and pass out from under the Government mortgage. They are sold, and sold by wholesale. Scarcely one acre of valuable land in the original grant, except on the Southern Pacific line, remains in the hands of the railroad company to which they were granted.

Mr. KERNAN. I am not in favor as a rule of exempting land that is subject to mortgage from taxation. In my State such lands are all taxed and the mortgagee has to look out that he does not lose his title by paying the taxes himself if his mortgageor does not. But here is a case where, as I understand the bill, a title has not yet passed to the railroad companies, but they have an equitable right to have the land patented when they pay the costs of the survey. To some extent that is the condition of things. But supposing they had passed to the railroad companies, should the Government be put in a position where to save its rights under the mortgage it will have to pay the State taxation on the lands which it never got one cent for, which it holds only as a pledge from the railroad companies? If the States can collect their taxes out of the personal property of the railroad companies, or anything else but the lands that the Government has as a lien on, I shall be very willing to see it done.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the Senator from New York is under some misapprehension as to the facts of the case.

Mr. KERNAN. That may be. I say that is the way I understand the facts, and I want to be put right if I am wrong.

Mr. PLUMB. The Government mortgage is as a rule not a second mortgage on these lands. There are already I think two mortgages to private individuals, and whatever lien the Government has is at least a third lien; and it is a lien which the Government never heretofore has attached any value to, because it imposed on the railroad companies the obligation to sell the lands, thereby discharging whatever lien the Government might have upon them.

In the next place, as soon as the railroad companies pay this $3 or $4 to the quarter section, then the Government patents it, and that discharges the lien also. So that there is no lien reserved to the Government for any beneficial interest which the Government has or expects to have in the lands except as to the cost of the surveying, and that we provide for the payment of. So the Government when this bill passes will be in precisely the same condition with reference to its beneficial interest that it was before. We only prevent the postponement of the taxation of these lands for an indefinite period, as is now the case.

Mr. KERNAN. If the Senator is right, and I assume that he is because he is familiar with the subject, then we have really got no lien on these lands that is worth anything.

Mr. PLUMB. That is it.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senate might as well know that these lands were got from us without pay and without security. If that is so, of course I do not want to prevent them being taxed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is one other amendment I should like to suggest which has occurred to me from this discussion. On the second page I wish to strike out the word "shall" where it says "shall be subject" and insert "may," so as merely to give the consent of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up the resolutions I had the honor to offer to the Senate some days ago on the subject of the constitutional amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, as the judgment of the Senate, That the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been legally ratified, and are as valid and of the same paramount authority as any other part of the Constitution; that the people of each State have a common interest in the enforcement of the whole Constitution in every State in the Union, and that it is alike the right and duty of Congress to enforce said amendments, and to protect every citizen in the exercise of all the rights thereby secured by laws of the general character already passed for that purpose, and by further appropriate legislation, so far as such enforcement and protection are not secured by existing laws; and that it is the duty of the executive department of the Government faithfully and with diligence to carry all such laws into impartial execution, and of Congress to appropriate all moneys needful to that end.

Resolved further, That it is the duty of Congress to provide by law for the full and impartial protection of all citizens of the United States, legally qualified, in the right to vote for Representatives in Congress, and to this end the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, instructed to prepare and report, as soon as may be, a bill for the protection of such rights, and the punishment of infractions thereof.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask whether the naval appropriation bill does not come up as the unfinished business now, unless we set it aside?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will come up as unfinished business at half-past one o'clock. The motion of the Senator from Vermont will then be in order. It will be for the majority of the Senate to determine.

Mr. BLAINE. The naval bill has been postponed a little on my request as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I had some observations to submit on the bill before its passage, and I thought the understanding in the Senate was that I might go on at half-past one to-day. I will keep myself inside of an hour, and I shall not delay the public business much by anything I have to say. I wish the Senator from Vermont would postpone his motion until I can have that privilege.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Maine spoke of having the naval bill postponed yesterday for the purpose indicated, I, if I correctly remember, notified him that I had informed our friends on the other side of the Chamber, some of them, that I expected to move this matter to-day, which has been lying a good while—it is a matter of a good deal of public importance—and that I must do so. Of course it is for a majority of the Senate to determine. I hope the consideration of these resolutions will not take long, and then we can take up the naval bill and hear my honorable friend and dispose of the naval bill by voting on his amendments, and so on, which will take some time.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know that it will. Of course I shall have to submit to the pleasure of the Senate. I should be very glad to go on now.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from Vermont expects to speak upon his resolutions, of course there will be none to object to his doing so. If, on the other hand, it is not his purpose to speak at all, then it will be a matter for the consideration of those that have to vote on the resolutions and on the substitute for them which has been laid on our tables to decide whether they will be silent or whether they will submit their views. I should not like myself, without any opportunity for consultation among Senators who favor the substitute of the Senator from Alabama, to be compelled this morning to vote without debate. Therefore, I ask the Senator from Vermont whether he proposes to speak to the resolutions or whether he wishes to have a vote without debate? If he will state that, we can determine what course we shall take. I do not know that I shall take any part in the debate, but there are others who may wish to debate the question. I hope the Senator from Vermont will express his purpose. Of course, after we have heard him make his remarks—and we shall listen with pleasure to his remarks—we can then determine what course we shall take.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, is the naval bill the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CONKLING. And it will prevail except for the motion of the Senator from Vermont?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will.

Mr. CONKLING. If I heard aright, the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] said that he wished to speak upon the naval bill and was ready to speak now, and intended, when the hour came, to proceed with his remarks. I have heard no reason, absolutely none, why his convenience should not prevail, and, therefore, I shall vote against the motion to displace the naval bill. These resolutions are important, as the Senator from Vermont says, but I can conceive no possible advantage in considering them to-day rather than to-morrow; and I think it is a custom, as old as any custom in the Senate, when a Senator has expected to address the Senate upon a topic actually pending, not to displace it when the time for it arrives, and particularly in order to consider something else not urgent in time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ought to say in reply to the Senator from New York, that when it was proposed yesterday that the naval bill should go over for a speech of the Senator from Maine in respect of the amendments he intended to offer, I stated then that this matter had been lying so long that I felt it to be my duty to move it this morning; but, nevertheless, the Senate allowed the naval bill to go over, and, as I understood it, subject to the question which the Senate preferred to take up. So I do not feel that I am violating any understanding.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all; I did not so state. Of course, it is a matter for the Senate to decide.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the naval appropriation bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 6141) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes and to appropriate $40,000 for the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives;

A bill (H. R. No. 5655) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1878;

A bill (H. R. No. 6130) for the relief of Elizabeth B. Higgins, Joel Higgins, and Brand Higgins, of Phillips County, Arkansas; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6137) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to Albert V. Conway, substituted trustee for certain registered United States bonds redeemed or assigned by the Government upon forged assignments.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1242) to repeal section 1233 of the Revised Statutes, relating to company cooks in the Army.

The message further announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the printing of additional copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year ending June 30, 1877, for the use of the Superintendent.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 5,000 copies of the report on the lands of the arid regions of the United States by J. W. Powell; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (S. No. 854) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis, in the State of California;

A bill (S. No. 1297) for the protection of dairymen, and to prevent deception in sales of butter and cheese in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 1374) authorizing the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution to appoint an acting secretary in certain cases; and

A bill (H. R. No. 613) subjecting the Fort Wayne military reservation, in the State of Arkansas, to entry as other public lands in said State.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAWES. Before the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] proceeds I desire to offer an amendment, which, I suppose, will not involve any debate. The Senator from Maine prefers that it be adopted, if at all, before he proceeds. I offer this amendment to come in after line 567:

Provided, That if the amount appropriated for any item of the pay or quartermaster's department of the Marine Corps for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, shall prove insufficient for its purpose, the excess in any other item or items of the respective departments may, with the written consent of the Secretary of the Navy, be applied thereto: Provided, That the excess in the items of one department shall not be used for any insufficiency in the items of the other department, and that the total amount appropriated for the respective departments for said fiscal year shall not be exceeded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If I understand the amendment correctly we had just as well appropriate all that is in the bill in bulk for general uses without any specification of items whatever.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator does not quite understand the scope of the amendment. It only authorizes the transfer of any balance of one item in one department to a deficiency in another item in that department of the Marine Corps appropriations, but not from one bureau or department to another. I will state that it is precisely the language of the Army bill of last year, and it is not an unusual provision in an appropriation bill, as I happen to know. It has been considered also by the committee, and I believe meets with their approval.

Mr. WINDOM. I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I certainly shall have to understand the amendment more correctly than I do now, or I must object to it. If I understand this amendment to the naval appropriation bill, it is to allow transfers from one department to another. I do not know whether it covers the bureaus or not; I should like to have it read again, and then the Senate will see what it is. It is certainly objectionable to me to provide that when money is appropriated for a particular purpose it may be changed and go to some other purpose in a wholesale way. It is not right in principle.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is that necessary?

Mr. DAWES. I will read the provision of law as it exists in the Army bill of last year:

Provided, That the appropriations under the head of "Pay department" in this act, amounting to $11,589,287.18, shall be accounted for, * * * and in case any item of the said appropriations shall prove insufficient for its purpose, the excess in any other item or items thereof may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under this head shall not be exceeded.

Precisely the same provision this amendment applies to the Marine Corps of the Navy; so that, if there should happen to have been an insufficient sum appropriated for any particular item like the clothing, for instance, and more than enough for some other particular item in the Marine Corps, with the written consent of the Secretary of the Navy the balance over and enough to pay that particular item may be taken to pay the other item without exceeding the whole for that corps. That is the provision.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I dislike to interfere with the Senator from Maine if he is ready to go on, and I therefore hope that this will be laid aside until he has concluded.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection. I do not desire to interfere with the Committee on Appropriations on the Navy appropriation bill, but this usual provision seemed to have been omitted by oversight rather than intentionally.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to have the two amendments read of which I gave notice last evening.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendments of the Senator from Maine.

The Secretary read as follows:

That a board of three naval officers, from either the active or retired list, be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to consider and report to the next session of Congress the number of officers, line, staff, and warrant, needed for a navy with 7,500 men; and that, until hereafter directed by law, promotion in the Navy above the grade of ensign shall cease: And further, That the same board of officers shall consider and report whether any of the present navy-yards may be dispensed with, and whether, in any other way, the expenses of the naval establishment may be decreased without impairing its efficiency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So as to save the point; I make the point of order that this is against the rule about legislation on appropriation bills; and so as to the other, I do not ask to have the point of order decided now, as I do not wish to cut off the observations of my friend.

The Secretary read the other amendment of Mr. BLAINE, as follows:

That from and after July 1, 1883, only such number of the graduates of the United States Naval Academy in any one year shall be entitled to appointment as midshipmen in the Navy as are required to fill vacancies of that grade existing on the 1st day of July in each year; those entitled to appointment to said vacancies to be determined by the academic board on the basis of their standing in the graduating class. And if the number of midshipmen shall not have been previously fixed and limited by law, it shall be the duty of the Secretary to so fix and limit it on or before July 1, 1883.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I desire to reserve the point of order on that also.

Mr. BLAINE. It was reserved by the Senator from Vermont. I take no advantage.

Mr. BECK. The point ought to come from the Naval Committee, perhaps.

Mr. BLAINE. In any remarks I shall make on the naval appropriation bill, Mr. President, I desire to say in advance that neither in word nor spirit do I intend to criticise the administration of the Navy Department either present or past, and still less do I intend by the remotest possible implication to make any reflection upon the gallant corps of officers that make up the Navy of the United States. I have no desire nor have I any grounds to reflect on either, and if I reflect on any department of the Government it will be on that of which I have had the honor to form a part for a considerable number of years. If there be any fault to be criticised, if there be any practice to be reformed, if there be any reorganization that is desirable and demanded, it is for Congress to do it; and if it should have been made before, it is the fault of Congress not to have made it, and not the fault of either Secretary, or bureau chief, or line, or staff, or warrant officer in the Navy.

At the same time, Mr. President, I must speak my mind very freely about what I consider the present condition of the Navy, and first and especially about the large number of officers the Navy contains. We have limited the Navy by law to 7,500 men, and for those 7,500 men, taking in commissioned officers of staff and line and warrant officers, and not counting the retired list, of course, which should not be brought into the discussion, we have a total of 2,020 officers, or we have to-day one officer to three men and a fraction in the Navy. That is excessive. I should infer so without any knowledge on the subject, and of course as to the organization of the Navy I do not profess to know much; but I should infer on the mere statement that it was excessive; and to prove that it must be excessive, I have here the last register of the British navy. Our Navy, as I have said, is limited to 7,500 men. We have in all in the Navy to-day 91 vessels. We have 38 to-day, I believe, in commission, as the term is, and we have, as I have already remarked, 2,020 officers. Take the British navy, which has 320 steam-vessels of war and a total, including all that belongs to the navy, of 494 vessels. They have 4,990 officers, with something over 60,000 men, in the navy. They have available for naval service more than five times the vessels in number and far more than that proportion in effective force; and while they have between nine and ten times as many sailors as we have, they have less than twice and a half the number of officers. Or, if you choose to take it in another form, throwing out the warrant officers and taking simply the officers of the line, rejecting the staff, we show a total of about 800, and counting the cadets, who are counted also in the British computation, we show about 1,000, and the British show against that about 2,300.

The comparison is quite as discouraging if we look at the French navy, which has a total number of line officers of 1,529; and I also hold the French naval register in my hand, or a book which contains the statistics. The French navy in point of number of vessels is almost as large as the British navy. Of course we all know that it is not so effective, but it is many times as large as ours, and yet the line officers of the navy of France are not more than double the line officers of the Navy of the United States, possibly a shade more than double. I infer that these facts are worthy of our attention. I infer that we are having a navy far more numerous in the department of officers than we require to the number of ships or the number of men to which we have limited it by law.

Take the navy-yards. For the immense navy of Great Britain, the largest and most effective in the world, there are in the whole island two great navy-yards, Chatham and Portsmouth, and two subordinate ones at Sheerness and Devonport, making in all four. The French navy has three principal yards, Cherbourg, Brest, and Toulon, and two subordinate ones at Rochefort and Lorient. We have on this coast, from latitude 37° to latitude 43°, on six degrees of coast latitude, seven navy-yards. We have one at Washington, one at Norfolk, one at Philadelphia, one at New York, one in posse if not in esse at New London, one at Charleston, and one at Kittery or Portsmouth. Of course that is beyond all possible requirement of our Navy. We have one at Pensacola, which it is presumed is necessary to retain for the Gulf uses, and certainly the one on the Pacific coast is absolutely essential; but that any person can infer that on six degrees of our coast latitude we need seven navy-yards is a vast stretch of imagination.

I might have said when I was disclaiming any possible intention of either arraigning the civil department of the Navy or the line officers themselves, that I have no intention of making any partisan accusation, and still less any intention of making any partisan confession. I do not desire to inculpate either party or to exculpate either, and so far as all these navy-yards except the shadowy one at New London are concerned, they come down to us from "the good old days of democratic economy." We inherited them, and we inherited one more which we have abandoned; that is the one at Memphis. That was a brilliant streak of economy, of course, to put a navy-yard at Memphis, 800 or 1,000 miles from the mouth of the Mississippi River. The old story went that the navy-yard at Memphis was put through Congress because the two rival candidates for governor in Tennessee, preceding the great contest of 1844 between Mr. Clay and Mr. Polk, both came here, and the democrat said to a democratic Congress "if you do not put this navy-yard through, I am dead," and the whig candidate said "if you whigs do not vote for it it will kill us at home." And so they got a pretty nearly unanimous vote for the Memphis navy-yard. They might as well have put one above the Falls of Saint Anthony. It went on in a sort of sickly condition for 10, 15, or 20 years, not being finally dismantled until the war.

There is of course a vast and useless expenditure in the navy-yards, a very large and overwhelming expenditure in that department which we do not in any event need.

And when you come to the pay of the Navy, of course it shows just this proportion. If you have officers you must pay them, and the pay of Navy officers in the bill which is now before the Senate is for officers in commission $3,822,875, for retired officers $645,400, and for some other civilian attachés that come under the head of officers embraced in the fifty-third line and lines following $475,000, making a total of $4,943,275, or in round numbers five million dollars. Next as to the men. For the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men in the engineer force and for the Coast Survey service, for all that are included in any form direct or indirect in the Navy, we pay $2,300,000; so that of what is called the pay of the Navy more than two-thirds, nearly five-sevenths, are required for officers, showing of course the top-heavy condition that the register shows in regard to the Navy.

From the Naval Academy for the last fourteen years since the war we have added an average of fifty officers per annum to the Navy, and we are continuing to do it. The rule now is the very same that it is at West Point or was until last year we had some legislation upon the subject, that any boy who graduates at the Naval Academy after being duly appointed shall be commissioned as an officer in the Navy. That was so in regard to West Point until the legislation of last year. Congress by a pretty nearly unanimous vote in both branches has decided in regard to the graduates at West Point that those only shall be appointed to offices in the Army for which there are vacancies at the time of graduation. I think that ought to be the case in regard to the Navy. If not, you are liable to add from fifty to seventy-five officers annually to your Navy, and there is no limit now fixed by law at all to the lower grade. We fix the limit down to ensigns, but for midshipmen there is no limit at all, and you may pile in midshipmen until they are there by the thousand for that matter if you take time enough, and at the rate at which retirement or death thins out the upper grades of the Navy you will find such a disparity between the incoming and the outgoing as must lead to a steady annual increase in the officers of the Navy.

Now, I ask simply that after 1883 graduation at the Naval Academy shall not of itself entitle a man to be commissioned in the Navy, but that only such number shall be commissioned for which there are vacancies in the Navy at the time, leaving the academic board to determine that on the merit of the graduates. I put it at 1883, just as last year the legislation respecting West Point was put at 1882, for the simple reason that the boys who have been appointed to the Naval Academy, just as those who were appointed to West Point, went there with the understanding, and, if you choose, with the pledge from the United States, that upon graduation they should be appointed to office, and I certainly would not break the faith of the United States to the naval cadet, but let every one who has been entered with that understanding under the law have its full benefit; but if you make the law now for the next year, the naval cadet who enters understands from that day that his entrance upon the naval list of the United States depends upon the merit of his graduation, and that only those shall be selected from the graduating class for whom there are vacancies at the time.

It seems to me that this is entirely just, and in the case of West Point, and of the Naval Academy also, I do not think it will be any harm to graduate a very large number who are not entered in the Navy or Army. They will have no ground to find fault certainly. They will have received great educational advantages as a gratuity from their Government; they are equipped for the battle of life, and if ever the Government has need of their services, as it unfortunately did in a recent era, they will come in the future as they did in the past—for there was a very small number of graduates of West Point that did not find their way into the Army, on one side or the other, during the late war—and so it will be in the future. You will have a military knowledge spread throughout the country, and, no matter how many shall graduate there at the public expense under the present organization, let only those be put upon the regular Army list who stand highest, and who are for the time being needed to fill vacancies actually existing.

Mr. President, of course I would not do a harsh thing to the naval officers. I have no proposition to make except that a naval board composed of officers themselves shall tell us what we ought to do. I would not turn out an officer who had a good record, and who had devoted the best years of his life to the service of the United States, but by retirement, made larger than it now is by some form which is easily to be devised by men who take the subject into consideration, we can bring down our Navy to the proper proportion of officers and men; and we can, by dispensing with the surplus number, and by dispensing with useless navy-yards, and in other ways, reduce the naval expenses of this country by a very large figure.

And then, Mr. President, connected with this, and of more interest to me than any other part of it, is the fact that we are trying the impossible experiment of building a navy from the top.

Mr. EATON. If you build from the top it will go down.

Mr. BLAINE. I accept what my honorable friend from Connecticut says, if you keep on building it from the top it will go down to the bottom. We are trying to build a navy from the top, I repeat. It never has been done, and it never will be done in this world. You cannot make a navy by graduating cadets at Annapolis. It is in that respect different from an army. Our experience in the last war, on both sides, shows that men make good soldiers in three months, and in a year they are veterans. That is not the case with a navy. You cannot improvise a sailor any more than you can improvise a mountain. He has to grow, and you cannot grow him as an exotic. You cannot grow a sailor in your Navy unless there is a surrounding commercial atmosphere, unless there is a great mercantile marine that shall continually replenish it and build it up from the bottom. There never has been a navy in this world worth anything that did not grow out of a mercantile marine. There never will be.

And now in regard to our mercantile marine the contrast since some of us here entered Congress, the contrast since the beginning of the war with the present time is very startling. When we needed a blockade from the mouth of the Rio Grande to the capes of the Delaware we had 70,000 sailors on board our ships. Eight thousand sailors were enlisted in one town in my own State, the city of Portland; twenty-two thousand sailors were enlisted at Boston. I should like any man to get 8,000 sailors enlisted at Portland or 22,000 at Boston to-day. They are gone. Our mercentile marine by a variety of causes is swept away, and of the causes leading to its destruction too much has been attributed, in my judgment, to the effects of the war. The war had a great deal to do with it; but had that been simply the cause we would have recovered from it, for its effect was in its nature temporary. But the real cause was deeper and far more serious than the four years' war, however serious that was.

The war only gave an opportunity to our rivals. If there had not been new conditions, we should have been able after the war to have recovered ourselves. But those new conditions were and are to-day, as has been repeated here over and over again on this side of the Chamber and on that, those conditions are that the commerce of the world has entirely changed, and you might just as well attempt to arm your soldiers with bows and arrows as to rebuild the mercantile marine of the United States by a mere increase of sailing vessels. The marine of the future, more and more every day, is a steam marine, and we who stand here furnishing a larger amount of freight than any other country in the world—I was going to say any other two countries; I doubt if there be any two countries in the world that furnish as large an amount of ocean freight as the United States—we stand here to-day gaining nothing whatever out of that, or so little that it only serves to "point the moral." We furnished last year 13,000,000 tons of ocean freight, and the profit on carrying that and the passengers that belong to the sea was $115,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Does that include the coasting trade?

Mr. BLAINE. No; wholly foreign. It all went from our shores and came back. That which goes of course is more bulky when you measure it by tons than that which comes.

Mr. EATON. Over $80,000,000 in gold was paid into the pockets of foreign ship-owners.

Mr. BLAINE. My friend anticipates me in that. Nearly $89,000,000 out of $115,000,000 was so paid into foreign hands; I believe only $26,000,000 into ours; and that has been going on and is going on and will continue to go on unless the United States does something that shall change it. And we cannot afford not to change it. I say to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance that unless conditions that we dare not anticipate should continue to favor us, it is not a possible thing in this country to maintain over a long series of years specie payment here with that draught made upon our resources, and with that draught stopped specie payment will maintain itself. Gentlemen here remember the panic of 1857, how it smote the country, how it went over the continent with the force and violence of a tornado, prostrating great mercantile houses and manufacturing and commercial interests, and yet inside of ninety days from the suspension of specie payment the banks of New York, Baltimore, and all the great cities of the country resumed. Why were they able to resume specie payment after that disastrous panic? Simply because the freight moneys that lay to the credit of American commerce in London were gold to be called on by those who here needed it for the resumption of specie payments, and the gold that was deposited in London to the credit of American ship-masters and American ship-owners was the very gold on which the banks of this country resumed in 1858, and that is the gold that we do not have to-day. We should have had no need, we should have been under no necessity of selling bonds to buy gold to resume specie payments if our fair share of the freight moneys on our own commerce had been coming into our coffers. Eighty-nine million dollars went last year into the coffers of Europe on American freight; less than $26,000,000 came here. Give us our fair share, and specie payment, I repeat, will maintain itself.

In the last ten years—and that seems a very short period to most of us—we have sent and brought, fetched and carried between this country and foreign countries from eleven to twelve thousand million dollars' worth of products, and the freights on that with the passengers attached to the trade were over $1,100,000,000, and out of that $1,100,000,000 the European nations got nearly $900,000,000, and that was drawn right from us, and we go on here appropriating for our Navy to protect a commerce that does not exist.

I am not finding fault with this naval bill, understand me. The existing naval establishment requires that we should appropriate the amounts it contains. We can do nothing else but appropriate this money as we stand to-day; but I am asking, for I can ask nothing else, in the name of American commerce that you will give to its revival the sum you are wasting on the Navy. You can take four to five million dollars out of the naval expenditure, in my judgment, without impairing the efficiency of the Navy, and if you will give four or five million dollars per annum to building up American commerce in this country you will turn $50,000,000 per annum of gold coin into your coffers; you will employ countless thousands of men on the sea and on the land, and you will change the whole commercial and mercantile character of the continent. Oh, yes, but, says my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] "Let us have free ships; let us have a right to bring in free ships and we will do it." How? What possible advantage do you give to any man to-day by enabling him to get an American register for a foreign ship? Mr. Vanderbilt, the great capitalist and head of the New York Central Railway, is just establishing, in connection, it is said, with foreign capital, a line of steamships to run in connection with his road. The ships are foreign-built. Every spike that was driven, every hammer that was sounded upon them, went to build up a foreign mechanic. Every sailor, stoker, fireman, engineer on board, is a foreigner; every officer is a foreigner; and that is a line of American steamships; and that is precisely such a line of American steamships as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] would establish by allowing the free registry of foreign vessels. Why?

Mr. EATON. At the proper time we will discuss that.

Mr. BLAINE. This is the proper time.

Mr. EATON. I do not think it is.

Mr. BLAINE. I said that the bill proposed would enable just that thing to be done and nothing else, and I say to the honorable Senator from Connecticut that he certainly would be departing from all the policy that has made his own little Commonwealth a great one if he advocates that policy.

Why take a $500,000 ship; a ship of about 3,000 or 3,500 tons, and a steamship of that size first class, fully equipped for freight and passengers costs just about a half million of dollars. There is not a single thing that goes into that ship from the time her keel is laid until she is ready for sea that cannot be produced in this country and that is not produced in this country except tin, the few dollars' worth of tin in her.

Mr. DORSEY. We have tin in California.

Mr. BLAINE. I am corrected. I am told that California produces tin. But you may take all the hundred things that go into that vessel and they are all produced in this country from the tree in the forest to the ore in the mine; and what does my honorable friend from Connecticut, who knows more of statistics than I do, say is the value of the raw material, and when you get that $500,000 ship ready for the sea what part of her represents actual material and what part labor? There is five thousand dollars' worth of material in her, and four hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars' worth of labor. Begin with the iron in the ore and the wood in the tree, and you have only five thousand dollars' worth of material in a thirty-five-hundred-ton ship, and every particle of the remainder has been produced and inwrought and upbuilt by American labor, and I understand my friend from Connecticut to insist that we had better have that $495,000 expended on the other side.

Mr. EATON. I will simply say to my friend from Maine, that when the Committee on Commerce report, as they will very soon I trust either one way or the other in regard to free ships, I propose to discuss that question, but not on the naval bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, it is connected with the naval bill. Three-fourths, I do not know but I may overstate it, but certainly one-half the report of the Secretary of the Navy is devoted to the commerce of the country, and a very able report it is. It does him honor. I certainly am not out of order in discussing on the naval bill that to which the head of the Department himself devotes so large a portion of his report. I say again, that what may be saved out of the naval appropriation will do that which I have already adverted to for American commerce. We do not show any of this, can I call it stinginess, in any other department. We have given 200,000,000 acres of public land to railroads; we have given $60,000,000 in money; and taking the value of those lands and the value of that money, and adding them together, it is safe to say that we have endowed railroads in this country with $500,000,000.

From 1846 to 1871 the Congress of the United States passed ninety-one acts for promoting the building of railroads. There has not been much legislation since 1871. There has been a reaction against the policy, but from 1846 to 1871, I repeat, a period of twenty-five years, the Congress of the United States passed ninety-one different acts and endowed the railroad system of this country with $500,000,000 of money, and that $500,000,000 of money produced more than $5,000,000,000 of money in this country. My judgment is that the Congress of the United States in everything they did in that respect did wisely. They cheapened freights. Clinton's ditch, as it used to be called, was sneered at when it was an experiment, but the minute the water was let into it it reduced the freights that had been $100 from Buffalo to New York down to $7 a ton; and it is not an exaggeration to say that at that day, before railroads were among us, the water that was let in from Lake Erie to that canal added $100,000,000 to the value of the farms west of it.

As individuals, cities, towns, counties, States, a nation, we have exerted ourselves to the utmost point of enterprise and vigor to build up railroads. We have a system that outruns all the world, and with great trunk lines threading the continent north, south, east, and west, in every direction. The very moment we reach the ocean limit, we seem to think we have done our duty, and that when we have got transportation to that point it no longer interests us, and we can safely give that over to the foreigner. Why, from Chicago to Liverpool is one direct line. I wonder how it would sound if Mr. Vanderbilt, who is running a line of steamships manned by foreign men, commanded by foreign officers, built in foreign yards, whose money earnings go entirely outside of this country, were to apply that to the New York Central Railroad and select all the brakemen and switchmen and conductors and tenders and officers on the Central Railroad from foreigners; to put all the locomotives on it that are made in England; to let all its earnings be exported. Such a policy would not be one particle more detrimental and destructive to the interests of this country than for us when that Central Railroad had touched salt water with all the countless products of the fertile West to give up all the profits of participation in the transportation of them beyond. From Chicago to Liverpool is a route of four thousand miles. We operate one thousand miles of it and give three thousand miles to the foreigner.

Mr. President, our ancestors of the last generation were not so sequeamish on this subject. They were not afflicted with theories; they were intensely practical, and after the peace of 1815 following the war of 1812 our commerce ran ahead of Great Britain's to such an extent that absolute alarm seized England. During the administration of John Quincy Adams, in a single year of the commerce between this country and Europe, one hundred and forty-five millions were carried in American vessels and only fourteen millions in those of other nations. The commerce amounted to about one hundred and sixty millions, and American vessels carried one hundred and forty-five millions of it; and I beg the Senator from Connecticut to remember that then in Parliament, and then through all their chambers of commerce, and then throughout all the commercial agencies of Great Britain an agitation was made that they would import free ships from America. They did not do it. They concluded that that would be their utter and final ruin, and that they never could catch up with us if they did that, and they resisted it, and they resisted it up to the point and until the time when they had got so far ahead by aid from Government, by the upbuilding of a great commerce, that they could successfully defy and laugh at competition. Then came in their free shipping act; and the policy which the Senator from Connecticut invites us to to-day is precisely that which the free-traders in this country on looking at England will find that she took into consideration and condemned and rejected in 1827 and 1828, and the English marine would never have been what it is to-day had they not at that time stood just where we ought to stand to-day.

I referred to 1817, to the generation that immediately preceded us; and I address my remarks to that side of the Chamber, because they claim a more distinct inheritance from the Jefferson and Madison and Monroe era. Mr. Monroe in 1817 had just come to the Presidency. We had passed an act which, if it were passed to-day, would revive American commerce with such a rapidity and thrill as would astonish people on both sides of the water. We passed an act providing that the products of no country should come into the United States except in American vessels or in the vessels of the producing country, and we held it there for years and years. These triangular voyages that sap the life out of our commerce could not be made under that law.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to state that there is now a bill before the Committee on Commerce making differential duties in favor of American shipping?

Mr. BLAINE. I am very much delighted to hear it, and I am sure the committee that should report that bill is in no possible danger of reporting that we had better abandon the art of ship-building in this country and get our ships in Europe.

Mr. EATON. That is another question.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all; it is the same question, if my friend will permit me.

Mr. EATON. Not by any means.

Mr. BLAINE. It is exactly the same question. If you intend to encourage American commerce by giving differential duties in favor of American ships it would be highly improbable that the bill should say in the next section that we do not want ship-building in the country, and if anybody sent over their old rubbish and trash and sold it at a low price we would take that and give it the benefit of an American register. Of course I do not use the phrase in any offensive sense, but I cannot conceive of a greater fraud than to call a ship of that kind an American ship. There is nothing in the history of the Government, there is nothing in any of its developments in which pride inheres more than in the ship. It carries the flag before all nations of the earth. It is the manifestation of our national power and our national existence.

Mr. EATON. One would suppose from the present reasoning of the Senator from Maine that that good ship over which the American flag floated, commanded by Paul Jones, was not an American ship because it had not been built in this country.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah, necessity knows no law. Paul Jones was fighting, and he had to take whatever he could fight with. We are not talking about what is the necessity of war; we are talking about what ought to be the policy of peace. If we are in a fight with a nation and can seize any ship that will whip the enemy, of course we will take her; and that is what Paul Jones did.

The Senator advocates the policy that should take up any ship built anywhere and put an American flag on her and employ her as an American ship. I say, and I repeat without any intention of offense in using the word, it is a fraud. It is against all the traditions and instincts of the American people. It is putting on a false trade-mark. The statute should be against it if the common law is not.

Mr. EATON. I am afraid my friend is not a lawyer.

Mr. BLAINE. It is a false trade-mark that you put on it.

Then again, when you say that we are not able to build an American ship in competition with foreign ships, and that we can get other ships cheaper if we will throw open the registry, do not my friends from Connecticut and Kentucky both see that if that be the necessity of to-day it will be far more the necessity to-morrow? It will be a much greater necessity the next day; and it will continue to be so much a necessity that in the course of a very short time the art of ship building in this country will have been lost.

Senators talk to us about what the nations of Europe do, and say that Germany gets her ships from England and that other nations get them from abroad. There are but two great naval powers in the world, or able to be great naval powers. The United States and Great Britain are the naval powers of this world; and the idea that with a continent containing the resources we have, with a population possessing the skill we do, with all the traditions and all the inducements that surround and govern the case, a Senator can rise in the American Senate and propose that the American flag be struck and that foreigners be invited to build our ships, and that we in turn agree to be dependent on them for a navy as well as for commerce, is a most extraordinary spectacle, if I may use the phrase.

I remind the Senator from Kentucky that the bill which I have read here was supported if not drawn by the illustrious man who then represented Kentucky in the other House, and who was its Speaker. I am not surprised, as the political developments have been made in the last few years, that from the Southwest this proposition should come, but my friend from Connecticut will excuse me if I say that I never expected to live to see the day when a New England Senator should uphold that policy.

Mr. EATON. I am glad the Senator has lived long enough to see it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I hope I shall still live long enough to see my honorable friend repent and reform. [Laughter.] I hope his length of days will be sufficient to make him repent and reform, and even to forget that he erred.

Mr. President, I will state my views on this subject, and I shall take the privilege of bringing the Senate to some vote that will test its sense on that question. My idea is that the Government of the United States should give to any man or company of men aid from the Treasury of the United States if he or they shall establish and maintain a line of steamships to any foreign port, or I might limit it to European, South American, and Asiatic ports. I would invite competition from San Francisco, from Portland, Oregon, from Galveston, from New Orleans, from Mobile, from Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington, Norfolk, Baltimore, New York, Boston, Portland, and everywhere. I would let all come in who can sustain it. The touchstone is what will be sustained by the trade, and that you can safely leave to the instinct and to the knowledge of American commercial men.

There is no reason in the world why Savannah, that caused the first ship by steam to be sent across the Atlantic, I believe, going from her port and bearing her name, should not be a great sea-port. There is certainly no reason why a very great foreign trade should not be concentrated at New Orleans. Some might try that could not probably sustain the enterprise, but there are various points throughout the country on our ocean front that would maintain with vigor, with success, and with pride to themselves and the country great lines of steamships to all the foreign ports of the world. I am radical on the question. I do not suppose the American Congress would go so far as I would, for I would certainly vote directly for the revival of the act of 1817, and I would write as the law of America for the present that the products of any country should come to the United States either in the vessels of the exporting country or in our own. If that sounds like unfriendly legislation, if it sounds like extreme legislation, if it involves some contradiction of the policy of the last twenty-five or thirty years, let it be said that we are legislating for an extreme case, and extreme cases require extreme remedies.

We carried five-sevenths of the American commerce when the war broke out. We do not carry one-quarter to-day, and if we come out of the deep abyss of humiliation that we are in we will come out of it by vigorous and strong-nerved and daring legislation, if you please. I would open it to all the business of the country, but I would put the race between American skill and the skill of all the world, with the utmost possible confidence that, sustained by this Government in the race, we would win. It is in our people. With an equal chance we can beat them. But, with the present condition of things, a hope for the revival of American commerce is as idle a hope as ever entered the brain of an insane man. Our trade is falling off 1 or 2 per cent. per annum as we stand to-day. It was less this year than it was last. It was less last year than it was the year before. It will be less next year than this.

I know no question that can in any manner engage the attention of the American Senate that is more worthy of their serious consideration and their deep deliberation than this. It is more far-reaching than any question before us, for I repeat, as I intimated, that with this steady drain out of us, this drain of $85,000,000 a year, in gold coin, this country cannot expect with confidence to maintain a specie basis. An adverse crop, a bad year, a balance of trade against us, and with the whole commercial marine in the hands of foreigners, we put specie payment and American solvency and American prosperity to a test that I shall grieve to see applied, and the result of which would be, I fear, most disastrous.

We voted $1,500,000 for the Navy without thinking. Anything that gets in the rut of an appropriation goes easily. You voted money this year because you did last; we will vote it next year because we did this. Bayard Taylor used to tell a funny story to the effect that in the Russian budget there appeared every year fifty rubles for goose-grease for the prince's nose. He said that one hundred and fifty years ago there was a sore nose on one of the princes, and goose-grease was prescribed for it, and so fifty rubles came into the budget; and although a sore nose has not since been known in the royal family the fifty rubles have been annually appropriated. Our appropriations run on in the same rut, and we need a stirring up from the bottom and a wholesome change.

When I speak thus I speak, I am sure, as a friend of the Navy. I come from the portion of the country that feels great interest in and great sympathy with the Navy. But a navy cannot be maintained as a fancy attachment to the Government. The Navy must have uses. The United States steam-frigate Tennessee has just returned from a three years' cruise. I sent to the Navy Department, and regret that I cannot have it in time to read it here to-day, for a statement of the expenses of that three years' cruise. I might be wild probably if I should venture to give the figures without the data; and therefore I will not do so; but I venture to say that it will surprise every member of the Senate. And I venture to say that on all that long three years' cruise, in all the waters, in all the oceans, on all the shores, the rarest thing the Tennessee met in her travels was an American ship, and almost the only flag she saw bearing the Stars and Stripes was at her own mast-head.

We want a navy, but we want something for it to do. We want a navy to protect the commerce, but we want a commerce in advance for the Navy to protect, and we want a commerce that shall not be one of favoritism; a commerce that shall not benefit one section at the expense of another, but one that shall be equal and just and generous and profitable to all. You will never get it by making this nation a tributary to Great Britain. You will never get it by banishing the art of ship-building from among our people. You will never get it by discouraging all possible aspirations for maritime and commercial supremacy, by a public proclamation from Congress that after nearly a century of gallant struggle, in which more than three-quarters of the time we were ahead in the race, on account of an accidental mishap that put us behind we of to-day, not having the nerve or the sagacity of those who went before us, sank before the prospect and asked other nations to do for us what we have lost the manhood and the energy to do for ourselves.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I confess to some amazement that a bill which I introduced some time ago and which is now before the Committee on Commerce for consideration, which I have had no opportunity even to state the reason I had for introducing, should have been made the text for such a tirade as the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has seen fit to indulge in to-day. But before I speak of that let me say as to the naval bill. He and I are members of the Committee on Appropriations. He is a member also of the Committee on Naval Affairs. He knows as well as I do that in a bill like that now under consideration no new legislation can properly be had. It is because efforts are often made such as he is making to-day to insert new legislation into appropriation bills by Senators not on the committee that much of the confusion growing out of our appropriation bills so often follows.

Although an influential member of the Naval Committee and fully informed as to all wrongs that may exist, he has failed to lay before the Appropriation Committee any of the grievances of which he now complains. Therefore he has no right now to seek to introduce new legislation into this bill without giving the Committee on Appropriations a chance to consider the questions. I made the point of order against his amendment on that ground; but I will now say to him that whenever he as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs to which he belongs, or on his individual responsibility, introduces any measure looking to a reform of the Navy, looking to the reduction of expenditures, or looking to any of the improvements he seeks to attain, I will go as far as he will or can in seeking to bring about all legitimate improvements and amendments of the present system of management of naval affairs.

I do not know why the present bill has been selected as the subject of attack. It is not my special province to defend either it or the Secretary of the Navy; but I have this to say, that the Senator from Maine was a member of the House of Representatives during the same time that I was, for eight years, when flagrant abuses were being perpetrated in the Navy Department which were known to him and known to all his party; which were exposed by me and by others, yet he never raised his voice against them.

For example, we had nearly six hundred ships in the Navy when the civil war closed and they are reduced down to ninety-one. They were sold many of them as old scrap, sold under every pretext, disposed of in ways that Congress knew nothing about and the proceeds used in all sorts of ways. If that action did not meet the approval of the Senator from Maine it never received his reprobation. I fear his trouble is that we have now, for the first time, a Secretary of the Navy who obeys the law, whether he likes it or not; a Secretary of the Navy who, in my judgment, is willing to unite with the good men of all parties in removing whatever wrongs can be found in his Department. The highest tribute that could be paid to the integrity of the Secretary is the fact that a democratic committee, a committee politically hostile to him, in the lower House of Congress, reported the bill now under consideration almost word for word as he suggested it, and a democratic House of Congress passed it without crossing a t or dotting an i. When he came before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and we had the bill under consideration, the few alterations that we made in it were made at his suggestion, because we were satisfied, upon full consultation, that there was nothing in it that did not comply with existing law and which was not required by the good of the service.

The Senator from Maine was a member of that committee as well as myself, and he could find no fault with what a democratic House had done and what the Secretary of the Navy had recommended. The Secretary, it is true, said in his report a great deal about our lost commerce, said it well, and said it truly; and when I come to speak relative to the bill that I introduced, which the Senator from Maine attacks so fiercely, by which I seek to allow our citizens to buy ships wherever they please, I shall ask the careful consideration of the Senate to what the Secretary says about our lost commerce. Before touching that subject, however, I propose to show that the Secretary is not creating deficiencies; on the contrary, that he is endeavoring in good faith to comply with the obligations imposed upon him as Secretary. I will read what he says in his report about the workings of his bureaus; and I will say further that he is the first Secretary we have had that I know of in the last ten or fifteen years who has been able to report balances of appropriations ready to be paid back into the Treasury, instead of coming in asking for deficiencies by the million which they themselves created.

It is due—

Says the Secretary:

> It is due to the bureaus of the Department that special attention should be called to their several reports, wherein the details of the work done by them during the year are given. They show an amount which could not have been accomplished without the utmost watchfulness and care on the part of the officers in charge of these bureaus. And the economy practiced in their disbursements cannot fail to arrest attention. The total balance standing to their credit at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, as previously stated, was $501,272.10, made up in favor of each bureau as follows:

Yards and Docks	$40,685 84
Equipment and Recruiting	238,879 20
Navigation	24,750 21
Ordnance	18,586 88
Construction and Repair	37,863 73
Steam Engineering	28,230 09
Provisions and Clothing	102,736 93
Medicine and Surgery	9,539 22
Total	501,272 10

> It is also due to the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam Engineering to refer to the amount of work they have respectively done in repairing ships, engines, boilers, &c., all of which is especially set forth in their reports. Seventy-five vessels have been more or less repaired, according to their condition, and ten of them have been thoroughly repaired, together with engines and boilers, and made ready for sea. Two others, the Nipsic and Galena, are in rapid progress toward completion. The machinery of every vessel repaired has been thoroughly overhauled and put in the best condition, and the policy of substituting four-bladed screw propellers for the various types of two-bladed and patent screws has been initiated. These changes have been attended with the best results, an increased speed of from one to two and a half knots per hour having been obtained, without increase of engine-power developed. It is designed to continue these changes until all our vessels are fitted with this type of propeller.

Mr. President, it is gratifying to be able to state that with the smallest appropriation made in the last twelve years the present Secretary of the Navy has a balance of over half a million of dollars in his hands instead of calling upon us for deficiences. The present bill, that he is now content with, which the House passed and the Committee on Appropriations recommend, is smaller than any that has been passed since the war. Turn to the finance reports. It is admitted that our Navy has been reduced down almost to nothing, that we sold hundreds of the ships that we had on hand and expended the money in ways that Congress knows nothing of, and we have been making up deficiencies year by year in the face of enormous expenditures, all at least meeting with the silent acquiescence of the Senator from Maine. The annual expenditures for the Navy in 1867, (see Finance Report for 1877, page 16)—I read in round numbers—were $31,000,000; in 1868, $25,000,000; in 1869, $20,000,000; in 1870, $21,000,000; in 1871, $19,000,000; in 1872, $21,000,000; in 1873, $23,000,000; in 1874, $30,000,000; in 1875, $21,000,000; in 1876, $18,000,000; in 1877, the year to which I allude, $14,000,000; and we are now making an appropriation of $14,000,000.

Therefore, there can be no serious fault, as I think, found with this bill. I have felt it necessary to say this much in regard to the action of the House of Representatives and of the Committee on Appropriations to show that, having no power to change the law, no right to cavil with it, in fact nothing to do except to pass upon the laws as we find them, and examine the workings of the Department to see that everything is fairly and honestly done, we are able to say, and men of all parties I think agree, that if the other Secretaries and executive officers of this Government should obey the law as carefully and be as economical in their offices as the Secretary of the Navy is in his, a genuine civil-service reform would be inaugurated. So much for that. But the burden of the Senator's speech——

Mr. BLAINE. Before the Senator leaves that point, will he allow me to ask him, if I do not interrupt him, whether the deficiency bill, which was passed last year, and which cleared up all the points in dispute in regard to money, was not supported by him about as frankly and as cordially as by me?

Mr. BECK. What does the Senator say?

Mr. BLAINE. Did not the Senator support the deficiency bill of $3,200,000 to pay all the deficits?

Mr. BECK. On that question I desire to say that the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] had charge of the House deficiency bill, which embraced hundreds of items which I thought were of doubtful propriety, but they were payments to men who it was known had done the work; and, whether the former Secretary of the Navy had acted legally or illegally in making the contracts, the Senator who had charge of the bill said to the committee that the men themselves ought not to suffer. That official was under investigation in the House of Representatives, a bitter quarrel was going on there, as the Senator from Maine knows, the House had passed that deficiency bill and I did not want to drag the quarrel into the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator seems to have dragged it in to-day.

Mr. BECK. One word further. As the House of Representatives had acted upon and passed those claims I consented that the Senator from California should report the deficiency bill as it came from the House without renewing the investigation, especially as it was obvious that the men had done the work.

Mr. BLAINE. If I understand the Senator, not to interrupt him, he with me, and he and I, with every other Senator on this floor—for there was not an objection; the bill was passed without the dot of an i or the cross of a t—all voted that that money was due, and that if there was any dispute as to the precise legal authority for making the contract there was no doubt that the Government of the United States got all the benefit of the money expended. He and I on that ground voted to pay the money, and during our service in the House of Representatives, to which the Senator has referred, it would be pretty hard to find in the Globe or RECORD any particular vote on which he and I differed——

Mr. BECK. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLAINE. On this point. On a good many others I should hope there would be a great difference.

Mr. BECK. My record in the House is well known. I was explaining why the deficiency bill of last session was passed. I do not care to take more time about it; I only repeat that there is no ground of attack against the present bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I have not attacked the present bill.

Mr. BECK. And I have shown that it cannot be attacked successfully under existing law, and that the proposed amendments or changes of law ought to come from the Committee on Naval Affairs as independent propositions, and cannot properly be tacked on to an appropriation bill.

But what I wish to say more particularly in reply to the Senator is that the bill which I introduced in order to allow the American people to buy their ships wherever they see fit, to buy them as they have a right to buy everything else they need and must have except ships, where they can get them cheapest, is in my judgment not only a bill that cannot be "whistled down the wind," but the more it is considered the better the Senate will think of the measure. My proposition is not, as the Senator assumes, to have ships so purchased run by foreigners, owned by foreigners, officered by foreigners, but to be used under all the limitations of our navigation laws, which require every officer to be a citizen of the United States. I only seek to allow the men of this country who do our carrying trade to buy their ships as they buy their wagons and everything else they use, where they can buy them cheapest, so that we can compete successfully with the citizens of other nations for the great ocean-carrying trade of the world.

The Senator from Maine says that I seek to pull down the American flag when I advocate that policy. That is not true. It is because the American flag is now trailing in the dust, and because, as he says, that on a cruise of three years a ship-of-war of the United States failed to see the American flag except at her own masthead, when after years and years of sad and disgraceful experience we have been wasting $100,000,000 a year upon foreign nations for the use of foreign-built ships, having none of our own, enriching them and impoverishing ourselves, I seek to enable our citizens to own their own ships as all other nations of the world own theirs, buying them where they can buy them cheapest, so that they can carry on foreign trade in them as cheap as any other people. We must either do this or cease all efforts at competition. Is it more disgraceful to pay our own citizens for the use of a foreign-built ship than it is to pay foreigners for the use of it, as we are doing now.

Is the ship less an American ship because she was bought where she could be bought cheapest? Are the ships now run by the Germans and Italians less German or Italian ships because they were bought somewhere else, because these nations found that some other people build ships cheaper than they can? No. Is the coat upon the back of the Senator from Maine less an American coat because it was made in Paris, as I have no doubt it was? No. The ships once bought would belong to our own people, under the bill I introduced, and every dollar that they earned would be owned by American citizens, spent at home, and used at home instead of going to build up foreign nations, as is now doing by obstinately refusing to allow our citizens to buy while we are unable to build the ships we are compelled to use.

The confession is made and mourned over by the Senator that our commerce is gone; that we are getting worse and worse off every year; and the confession is also made that the war had less to do with it than was generally supposed. The official record shows that there were but seven steam iron vessels built in the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and the total tonnage of those seven vessels thus built scarcely exceeded the tonnage of one White Star steamer, being under 6,000 tons. That is our condition. A more deplorable one could hardly be imagined. I am glad even the Senator from Maine realizes it. That has been substantially our condition for years past. We are, I admit, going on from bad to worse. Out of all the great ships that leave the port of New York for all nations beyond the Atlantic not one carries the American flag. Must not something be done? What causes this? If we can build ships, why do we not build them? All agree that we do not build, cannot build, and yet must use them. It is because everything is protected by an infamous protective tariff to such an extent that whatever goes into a ship, from the first nail that is driven to the bunting at her masthead, makes her cost a third more than if built anywhere else in the world.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator must be aware that everything going into a ship can be imported free, and, with all the variety of things that are used coming in free, with that privilege, the ship-builders have not asked for a hundred thousand dollars' worth a year. They find it more profitable and more advantageous to use American material.

Mr. BECK. The fact remains that with all those privileges we have built less than six thousand tons of iron steamships in the last year, and iron steamships alone can compete for European trade. The delusion, I was about to say the fraud, of the suggestion just made is this: the ship built out of materials on which the drawback is allowed must be used in foreign trade forever; she never can enter the coastwise trade of the United States; that is left as a monopoly for the ships of Maine and New England. Our people cannot afford to build a ship upon such terms, because her life as a foreign steamer will perhaps be five years, while her life as a steamer for all purposes would be twenty years, and the very moment she ceases to live as a foreign steamer she cannot run as a coastwise steamer, nor can she enter into competition with the ships that are run by the monopoly granted by Congress to the States along the New England coast. Hence the privilege of allowing free material has never been worth anything; that fact is proven, because none are built, although we need them so badly. The necessity for their existence is so great that the Senator from Maine is appealing now to Senators to put their hands into the Treasury and impose further burdens of taxation upon the people to subsidize every line everywhere, and help to build ships for everybody, because they cannot build them without subsidy. I should like to know where the money for all these subsidies is to come from. I should like to know where new burdens of taxation can be imposed, for subsidy means taxation and nothing else. Can you increase your protective tariff and obtain more revenue? No man will dare to say so. Can you add more taxation by internal revenue? On what? You may put it upon the incomes of the rich. I think you will find in the pension bill which you passed the other day (the amount appropriated was called twenty millions, but it will turn out to be a hundred millions, to be expended in paying back pensions) that 5 per cent. upon all the incomes of this country will hardly pay the additional pensions you have provided for. At what point or in what way is the Senator from Maine going to get in the pockets of the great impoverished mass of the people to obtain subsidies? He will not allow us to buy our ships where we can buy them cheapest. He will not allow us to do what every other nation on the face of the earth is doing, and none of them, so far as I ever heard, feel any degradation by having bought their ships any more than they would if they had bought their horses or wagons or anything else abroad. They are delighted at our folly in giving up our great trade to them because we are too patriotic to do our own work in foreign-built ships.

No, it is our restrictive policy which has prevented us from having ships on the ocean. True, the distinguished gentleman alluded to by the Senator as from my State, who occupied a far more illustrious position than I or perhaps even the Senator from Maine does on this floor, favored in his early days the protective policy. There may have been some sense in it then. All other nations maintained it, and it may be that it was a proper thing for us then to do. Now times are changed. We are no longer a feeble nation struggling into existence. We will never be again invaded by a foreign foe. England in the days of Cromwell maintained prohibitory navigation laws, and, as the Senator from Maine said, in 1817 refused to repeal them, and suffered for her folly as we are doing now. Her commerce never increased and her ships never increased until 1849, when she did repeal her restrictive navigation laws; she even repealed her coastwise trade monopoly, going further than I propose, and did buy ships from America and did carry on her traffic in American ships from 1849 on. We sold ships to foreign nations up to and during the year 1860. We had in that year a profit of $23,000,000 in the carrying trade of the country, much of it by selling ships to England. England never thought she had pulled down her flag and trailed it in the dust when she bought our ships and waved her flag from their mastheads. She bought them, as I said, from 1849 up to 1860, when we were her principal competitor, and when our tonnage was almost as great as hers and was as great as that of all the other nations of the earth combined. She bought them; she manned them with her own officers and sailors, just as I propose we shall do now; she pocketed the profits they made, because she could buy them cheaper from us than she could build them, and her commerce grew and doubled and quadrupled while she was doing so.

There is no romance or foolish sentiment about business. England understands that. The illustration drawn by the Senator from Maine as to the action of England therefore not only falls to the ground but shows the fallacy of his argument, as during the most profitable years of England's commerce we were furnishing England with ships. Now, when it is shown that we have no carrying trade, and have no ships, and do not, and of course cannot build them, and cannot impose additional taxes upon our people without breaking down all their interests, neither by internal revenue nor by direct or indirect taxes, we are told that we must furnish more subsidies. Give! give! give! is the patriotic cry. Who is to give? Who can afford to give? Why should we give? when we are taxed to death already, when we can buy all the ships we need in open market for less than we could after all the taxation sought for as subsidies is imposed.

Mr. President, what I seek to do is not to trail the American flag in the dust; it is to make the American flag supreme on every sea. I would wipe out all the protective tariff restriction upon trade and commerce, all restrictions upon buying ships or anything else that were obstacles in our way, and let our people do what every other people are now doing, sell where they can sell highest and buy what they need where they can buy cheapest. Until that is done substantially we will have no prosperity in this country, and every donation you make, every subsidy you give is simply a tax upon the labor of the country and an oppression upon the great industries of the people. You cannot subsidize lines of ships anywhere without creating a monopoly. You destroy free trade and fair competition, because the subsidized corporations relying on their subsidy will drive from the ocean their unsubsidized competitors. You cannot protect American labor in the present state of the law. You protect American machinery by tariffs and by patents as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] is now struggling by his patent bill to do, so as to compete on equal terms with the best machinery in the world. For that reason we pay to encourage inventors. He perhaps properly insists that inventors should be protected so that we may be equal to any country by increasing the power of machinery to create products cheaply. But who or what law protects labor? The Senator from Maine and all who are in favor of high protection will take a Chinaman or a man from any other part of the world, and employ him to run that machinery, and turn off the American native-born laborer if the Chinaman or other foreigner will do the same work for one cent a day less than the American laborer demands. All the paupers on earth compete in American workshops on equal terms with the American laborer. There is no tariff for him, but there is a tariff piled mountain high upon everything that he eats, drinks, wears, tastes, or touches. That is the protection that the Senator from Maine and those who think with him are now clamoring for. Protection for machinery which belongs to the rich; free trade in labor from the Chinese up; with enormous taxes on property to protect wealth.

The Senator from Maine said in answer to the Senator from Connecticut that Paul Jones had a right to seize a ship wherever he could and fight an enemy with it. We are fighting a great commercial enemy now. We are in a fight where our existence as a great commercial nation is at stake. Being in a contest with England, France, and Germany, I would, as Paul Jones did, seize the necessary ships wherever we can get them on the best terms, and run them to the best advantage to break down our opponents in that competition. There are other wars besides battles where blood is shed. The life-blood of the nation is being drawn from us because we do not use the means at our command nor allow our people to go into a fair competition with other people, and this is done merely for the benefit of a few men in one corner of the country. The coastwise trade is an enormous monopoly to-day. That I do not seek to interfere with.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will allow me, why does he not seek to interfere with it?

Mr. BECK. Because I am willing to give you that much to keep you quiet if I can. If I can only maintain the great ocean carrying trade I am willing to pay that tribute, great as it is, for we pay tribute to everything in that corner of the Union. We paid five millions and a half the other day for their fisheries.

Mr. BLANE. You did not pay it at my request.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon, we paid it for the benefit of your people.

Mr. BLAINE. You did not pay it at the instigation especially of New Englanders. Do not charge that to us.

Mr. BECK. If the fisheries we were protecting are not for the benefit of New England, I do not know for whose benefit they are. They are not for the benefit of the balance of the country. I suppose the eight or nine millions now being scrambled over from the Geneva award, is to go in the same way. One hundred per cent. has been levied on the salt of the western farmer and given gratis to the fishermen to encourage that corner. The coastwise trade must be maintained, I suppose, for the same purpose, so that if a foreign ship, or a ship built here, even with the privileges the Senator from Maine speaks of, should undertake to carry cotton from New Orleans to New York for a dollar a bale, and a ship from Maine demanded $5, the man who owns the cotton is compelled to pay the ship from Maine $5, because under the navigation law no ship built in a foreign country can load in one port of the United States and land its cargo in another. All these monopolies will have to be endured a while longer. We will be fortunate if we can only reach the great markets of the world. The Senator may as well understand that the men of the West and of the South and of the great producing regions, insist that they have paid tribute to New England long enough, and if they can buy ships anywhere else cheaper, they insist that they have a right to do so, and that Congress in the present condition of the world is not treating them justly if it prevents it.

Something was said about the balance of trade. My friend [Senator DAVIS, of West Virginia] suggested, how about internal revenue? I turned to the finance report this morning, and I find that the State of Kentucky paid $9,800,000 of revenue last year. The State of Maine paid $79,000, less than $\frac{1}{8}$ of 1 per cent. of what Kentucky paid. But Kentucky wants nothing except fair play and a free contest with other people, free ships, free trade, free everything, so that we can sell what we produce and buy what we need without being taxed to death for the benefit of a few.

The Senator from Maine boasts of our present balance of trade. I have heard that before. The President of the United States at Saint Paul last summer boasted that we were on the highway to prosperity because of the balance of trade in our favor; that seems to be the hobby now. The Senator from Maine says that the balance of trade is all that now saves us from being poor. I have thought upon that subject and beg the attention of the Senate for a little while in regard to it, as I differ widely from the Senator from Maine and the statesmen of his school.

I appreciate fully the importance of having an honest balance of trade in favor of the people of the United States in their dealings with the people of other countries. I understand that a man or a nation whose expenditures exceed his or its income from production will in time become bankrupt; and I have steadily advocated all measures that tend to enable us to keep our means at home instead of enriching foreign nations. To that end I want our own people to own the ships which carry our commerce on the high seas, so that the $100,000,000 now paid to foreign nations annually for freights and passage money may be owned and spent at home. I desire to see all our bonds in the hands of our own people, so that the interest on our national debt, like that of England and France, may be retained and spent here instead of abroad. Still I insist that the men who trade and who own the bonds shall have the benefit of the profits, subject only to the portion they ought to contribute to the support of the Government which protects them and their property.

The present balance of trade in our favor about which we hear so much, which is heralded in high places so ostentatiously as conclusive evidence of returning prosperity, is a forced and fictitious balance under our present unjust, oppressive, and, I might say, iniquitous protective tariff. If we were allowed to sell what we produce where we could sell it highest, and buy what we need where we could buy it cheapest, and retain the present balance of trade under these conditions in our favor, each citizen obtaining the benefit of his transactions abroad, we would be on the highway to prosperity; but when the balance of trade is in our favor as it is now simply because our people are prohibited by law from buying what they need and must have where they can buy it cheapest, and are forced to pay at home to those protected by the tariff monopoly more than the people of any other country have to pay for like articles, the balance of trade thus coerced is a delusion and a fraud, injurious alike to the Government and the people. It only requires another step to be taken so as to make the highly protective tariff absolutely prohibitory, and not only the balance but all the foreign trade of the country will be in our favor. If that result could only be produced, the statesmen of New England would be able to congratulate the country on the perfection of a system where trade was all profit and no loss. Their claim would be: exports, $700,000,000; imports, nothing; America the richest country in the world—which means that a few men along the eastern seaboard who have been invested by law with power to compel forty-six millions of people to pay them any price they see fit to demand for all that their machinery can produce, which the mass of the people must have, have become the peers in wealth of the Rothschilds or the Marquis of Westminster, while the producers and consumers alike outside of the charmed circle have become paupers and serfs.

Perhaps I can make my idea of the working of the present balance of trade clearer by illustration than by argument. Assume that a Louisville or Cincinnati merchant or large western farmer ships a cargo of wheat to Liverpool; it is worth in that market $100,000; he meets there a ship from some port on the Mediterranean with which England has free trade laden with a cargo precisely similar to his own; he must sell in sharp competition with the European. No American tariff helps him there. The Englishman puts his hand into the bags of each and finding them alike pays the same price for each. The European pauper gets as much as the highly protected American, indeed has a decided preference over him. Why? Because he is willing to take in exchange for his wheat what the Englishman has to sell, and the American cannot. All trade is barter. People must sell in order to be able to buy. Both owners of the cargoes of wheat need and must have equal supplies to carry on their operations for another year; each needs machinery, clothing, and other things, and each is offered all he wants for $60,000. The European buys or takes in exchange sixty thousand dollars' worth of English products, loads his ship, and returns home to prepare for competition with the American in the Liverpool wheat market next year; and, mark you, he brings his wheat and takes back his supplies in his own or his country's ship, and has the profits both ways to spend at home, while the American has to pay freights to a foreign ship at such rates as combinations of foreign ship-owners may demand, as neither he nor his countrymen can afford to build and are not permitted to buy ships to carry their produce to foreign markets. I said the American could not buy in Liverpool what he needed, though anxious to do so, at $60,000. Why? Because he would have to pay $49,000 more at the New York custom-house before he could land his goods in his own country. He could buy the same goods in New England for $90,000, as the protected American manufacturer takes care to fix the price of his products lower than the foreign price with the tariff tax added. What is the result. The ship that carried the wheat of the American returned back empty so far as he was concerned. The Government of the United States received no revenue; that is, the people of the United States received no relief from taxation. The owner of the cargo of wheat had to pay $30,000 more for the supplies he needed than his European competitor and had to enter into competition with him in the production of another year's crop for the same market with an outlay of $90,000 against an outlay of $60,000 by his so-called pauper competitor. Nobody is benefited but the tariff-protected monopolist, and he does not pay one cent more to support the Government because of the gains he has made by the monopoly Congress has given him than his coachman does. Indeed he may invest his profits in United States bonds and escape all taxation, Federal, State, and municipal.

That is a plain illustration of the present system: each transaction is just like it. It must not be forgotten that seven-eighths of our exports are agricultural products which must be sent abroad and sold at whatever price they will bring. Our capacity for production is so great and our surplus is so large that it is impossible to consume it at home or retain it for higher prices; and, when ready for market, fat cattle, hogs, grain, cotton, tobacco, provisions, &c., cannot be held for a higher price, nor can the producer of them change his business to suit the markets. He must produce and sell or his farm goes to waste, and the foreign price regulates the price in the home market, as dealers in cotton, wheat, tobacco, and other staples well know. It is equally obvious that all freights, commissions, insurance, interest, and other charges, as well as intermediate profits, are deducted from the foreign market prices when the producer sells, so that each item of charge comes out of him, and he is the real competitor with the European pauper, without protection or the possibility of protection under our tariff laws; so that he is robbed both ways by the increased cost of production and the still greater increase of cost of all he consumes, while the men who get all the profits pay nothing out of their wealth thus obtained to relieve him from the burdens of Government taxation. Yet the mass of the people are persuaded to applaud the statesmanship which produces these results. In the case I have used as an illustration the custom-house books are produced with ostentatious parade, and make the following exhibit: "United States of America export from Louisville wheat of the value of $100,000 to Liverpool; import nothing; United States $100,000 richer by the transaction"—a glittering falsehood. The facts are, the United States have not received one cent, nor has the tax-payer been relieved from any burden. Foreign ships and commission merchants have pocketed the profits of transportation. The American owner of the wheat has had to compete at disadvantage with his European pauper competitor, and has been compelled by Congress to pay for the supplies necessary to carry on next year's business $30,000 more than they were worth in open market—$30,000 more than his European rival paid for the same things. Nobody has made anything but the protected monopolist in the eastern corner of the Union, who pays nothing for his privileges, has ostensibly nothing to do with the transaction, but is made by congressional tariff laws a secret partner who absorbs all the profits.

Bastiat, a very clever Frenchman, put two pertinent questions to the French ministry some years ago when they were talking the same nonsense about the balance of trade under protection that our republican managers are now. He said in substance that he had a friend, a merchant in Paris, France, who shipped to New Orleans, Louisiana, $200,000 worth of French manufactured goods and sold them there for $250,000, after paying all expenses of the ventures. He invested the $250,000 in American cotton as a return cargo and sold it in Paris, after paying expenses, so as to net him $300,000. The French custom-house books showed: France exports $200,000; imports $300,000; France $100,000 poorer by the balance of trade against her. But the Paris merchant had the $100,000 in his pocket and was richer by that amount than he was before the custom-house books impoverished his country to the extent of his profits. That was the first conundrum, which so far as I know the ministry never answered. The second was: The Paris merchant, encouraged by his success, invested the $300,000 in another cargo of French manufactured goods and started them to New Orleans. Unfortunately for him the ship and cargo were lost in a storm in the English Channel. The French custom-house books made the following entry of the transaction: France exports $300,000; imports nothing; France $300,000 richer. But the Paris merchant was a bankrupt. That is a fair illustration of the nonsense of our statistics as to the present balance of trade in our favor, which is so much lauded by our political savans.

I might elaborate this view more fully, but I have consumed much more time than I intended. One word only on another subject: I agree with the Senator from Maine that all the money that has been expended and the lands given for our great railways, as to which the Senator spoke so well, has been thrown away, so far as the country is concerned, as long as the present condition of things exists. You may extend the Southern Pacific to San Diego and the Northern Pacific to Portland, and you may pay all the bonds issued to the Central and Union Pacific, and do no public good. The people of this country expected when those roads were built that they would have a right to reach by the Pacific Ocean and by those roads the eastern world, and have the products of China, Japan, Australia, and the east brought back to them cheaper than they could raise them at home, and in return send our products to them; but you have by your navigation laws and your high protective tariff absolutely excluded the people of this country from the benefit of all that great commerce almost as effectually as if the Pacific Ocean were a sea of fire instead of being, as it should be, a great free highway for all the nations of the earth.

As long as we have such protection and such tariff laws our manufacturers are compelled to sell only to our own people and cannot reach anybody else. We cannot go upon the high seas, either to South America or to any of the great nations whose trade actually belongs to us, and sell our products to them, for we are not permitted to buy what they have and bring it home to start our own manufactories and keep them at work. Our mechanics, our laborers, and everybody else suffer because of this restrictive tariff. We must learn to work for small profits as other people do, and deal freely with all the nations of the earth, giving them what we have and taking in return what they have. That done, we will be what the Senator from Maine says we ought to be, and what I agree we ought to be, the greatest power in the world. It is to attain that position, it is in order to have our flag at the masthead of our own ships everywhere, with our people owning and running them, spending their profits at home, that I desire our people to be allowed to buy ships, as we cannot build them. That conclusion is irresistible from the fact that for twelve years, ever since the war, we have been growing worse and worse and losing year by year more and more, and as we cannot afford to be taxed any more for subsidies, and ought not to pay such tribute if we could, I desire to do the only practical thing that remains to be done, what all other people do, buy ships where we can buy them to the best advantage, take our products in them to the market where we can get the most for them, load them abroad with what we need, and land them here, subject only to such taxation as is necessary to support the Government. That done, we can manufacture cheaply and compete sharply with other nations; that alone can make us what we ought to be, a prosperous commercial people.

I beg pardon of the Senate for this rambling sort of argument. I had no idea of speaking this morning. I have been thinking about these questions, of course, and have been hoping they would come up at some time. I had no idea that they would on an appropriation bill, but I could not, after what was said, especially as to my motives in introducing the bill referred to, allow the argument of the Senator from Maine to pass without saying something.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am sorry my friend from Kentucky was surprised into an ex tempore speech from a manuscript, but he has gone off and carried the discussion into the regions of the tariff. I think, Mr. President, one of the happy things that comes out of the distress of England, if any happy thing could come out of a misery so deep and so profound as afflicts that kingdom, is that it gives a crushing answer to what I may call the free-trade rhodomontade of the Senator from Kentucky. England exists under every condition that he points out as desirable for us. She has been there for thirty years. She has carried the same notions about the balance of trade that the Senator from Kentucky has done. There is not the same amount of territory on God's green earth to-day that is suffering so terribly and apparently so incurably as England—real suffering, suffering such as we know nothing of in this country. There are very few people in the United States, even in the pressing stringency of the last five years, that have starved. Is there one? Does any man know of one human being that has been reduced to death by starvation? If the accounts that come to us from free-trade England, which the Senator from Kentucky so lauds, be true, there are thousands of the artisans of Great Britain staring starvation in the face, or having starvation stare them in the face. I point to the Senator from Kentucky as a more conclusive answer than I can give to him, this crushing reply to all his theories about the balance of trade and absolute free-trade in this country.

More than that, Mr. President. The Senator gave us a fancy sketch about a wheat merchant that found himself in an English market with 100,000 bushels of wheat competing with a wheat importer from some part of Europe, and showing how remorselessly the wheat-grower of this country was ground down in that competition. If the Senator from Kentucky means anything by his argument, if he is willing to follow it to its logical sequence at all and face its results manfully, he means that if all the people of this country would drop mechanical pursuits, which have been built up under the protective policy and turn wheat-growers, that would be an immense advantage to the western wheat-grower to-day. He says we have stimulated the production in this country of mechanical products by protective tariffs. Then, have we not stimulated also an immense production of agricultural products? and I repeat if the Senator follows his argument to its legitimate conclusion, it is that the millions in this country who are engaged in mechanical pursuits should be turned into followers of agricultural pursuits, and if that were so, I should like his one-hundred-thousand-bushel wheat or grain merchant to appear in London or Liverpool with his cargo, and have it competed with, not from simply the cargoes of Europe, but from an overwhelming over-production at home.

Now I drop the general points and come directly to the amendments. Shall I understand the Senator from Kentucky to object to these amendments?

Mr. BECK. I said I thought they were not germane to the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I admit that. I admit that a single objection under the rules can keep them out; but the Senator from Kentucky must not base his position on that ground, because there is not an appropriation bill scarcely of the last two years that has not contained very radical legislation from the House, and the Senator from Kentucky, in my judgment, speaking now from memory, has supported in every instance the legislation that has come up from the House. Therefore the Senator cannot take refuge in the fact that he objects to legislation on appropriation bills.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say to the Senator from Maine——

Mr. BLAINE. I did not yield the floor, but I am ready to hear the Senator.

Mr. BECK. I thought the Senator asked for an answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The Chair understood the Senator from Maine had yielded temporarily to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine said I could not with propriety make any objection because the amendments were not germane to the bill, I having at other times supported things that were not germane. I will say now that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] objected to one amendment because it was new legislation, and I objected to the other, and I think both objections are good.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I objected to both of them in the lump; to the first one the moment it was read lest I should lose my point of order by allowing it to be read.

Mr. BECK. That relieves me. The appropriation bills are loaded frequently with so much outside legislation that it is very hard to manage them or to get fair legislation. I know that, and desire now to say as to both propositions the Senator has made that if he will introduce them or report them from a committee they shall receive my support at once.

Mr. BLAINE. What I mean to say is, that while the Senator from Kentucky reserves his objection to legislation here, he has uniformly supported independent legislation that came from the House on these bills, and that leads me to say that the present attitude of the two Houses in that regard is wholly to the disadvantage of the Senate. The Senate by its new rules has absolutely and peremptorily restricted its own discretion, and the House has vastly enlarged its discretion, and I am at liberty to speak of that because it is a joint matter. Now, I maintain that either legislation on the appropriation bills should be a matter of joint rule, so that each branch shall know what the power of the other is, or we should not sit here and be spoon-fed by the House with whatever it chooses to administer to us, without any power whatsoever to regulate ourselves or do as we might wish to.

What I offer in regard to the Naval Academy is just what the Senator from Kentucky supported himself last year in regard to West Point. I want that read now, the first amendment in regard to the naval cadets. It was supported last year unanimously by the Senate, including the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken as to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the attitude of this matter is that the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. BLAINE. That was withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment referred to by the Senator from Maine, the Chair understands he has merely given notice of.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts was withdrawn until mine should be disposed of. I merely want it read now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Maine has given notice of his purpose to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Now I desire the first one read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to insert:

That from and after July 1, 1883, only such number of the graduates of the United States Naval Academy in any one year shall be entitled to appointment as midshipmen in the Navy as are required to fill vacancies of that grade existing on the 1st day of July in each year, those entitled to appointment to said vacancies to be determined by the academic board on the basis of their standing in the graduating class. And if the number of midshipmen shall not have been previously fixed and limited by law, it shall be the duty of the Secretary to so fix and limit it on or before July 1, 1883.

Mr. BLAINE. That, Mr. President, is literally a copy, mutatis mutandis, of the amendment which was adopted last year for the Military Academy at West Point; and I think I am correct in saying that as a Senator consents to that which he does not object to, the Senator from Vermont was consenting, and sat in his seat and let it go without protest or disclaimer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is greatly mistaken both in his premises and his conclusiens.

Mr. BLAINE. In what respect?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will tell you presently.

Mr. BLAINE. I will wait now to hear.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Keep on waiting, then.

Mr. BLAINE. I repeat that if the Senator made any objections to this when it was reported back from the Committee on Appropriations it has escaped my memory. I repeat also that, I will not say every one, but a very large majority of the appropriation bills of the past two years have had legislation upon them from the House, which the Senate has concurred in; and when the Senator from Kentucky offers to support an independent bill of that kind, he knows very well, and quite as well as I know, that the chances of an independent bill of that kind going through are as one against a hundred; that the only way to make it at this stage of the session an effective piece of legislation, is to treat it as I propose to treat it here.

The other has nothing in the world in it but a projét for some form of reduction of the expenses of the Navy; and when the honorable Senator from Kentucky asks me where I will find the money to do something for the encouragement of the American commercial marine, I point him to those two amendments. If he will give to that the amount which will be saved by those two amendments, I will guarantee him results far greater than he promises us by following the free-trade theories, which leave England to-day in deep and widespread distress.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Maine is not of opinion that the repeal of the corn law, so that the English people could buy our bread cheap, makes them now in a starving condition. Many of them may be starving, but their condition would have been much worse but for that repeal.

Mr. BLAINE. I am not going into that. I only point out to the Senator that the German Empire, which is free-trade, and the British Empire, which is free-trade, are not as prosperous nations to-day by an incalculable distance as the French Republic and the United States, which are protective countries, and the Senator may theorize to the end of time; I give him two large facts to chew upon and contemplate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say in reply to my honorable friend from Maine, that he entirely misapprehends the attitude that I have occupied in relation to legislative amendments upon appropriation bills. I think for more than ten years—I will not state the exact number because I do not study up my own record of actions as people do who are more justly prominent in affairs and who have larger expectations—I think for the last ten years, while the party to which I belong was in a large majority in both Houses, the Journals of the Senate and the records of debates will show that, in season and out of season, I have resisted legislation upon appropriation bills that did not relate specifically to the moneys expended.

In saying that, lest it be found like other very virtuous people that I have had an occasional slip in my behavior, I will add that it may be possible that in some time of emergency I may have been tempted by myself or by some unnameable persons into supporting some amendments on appropriation bills on the theory that they related directly to the expenditure of the moneys appropriated, that on sober reflection may hardly stand fire. There may be some occasions of that kind.

Mr. BLAINE. Where you proposed them yourself?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely. I do not profess to be much more virtuous than other people.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought as the Senator was making a confession he had better include all his sins in that regard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, Mr. President; there would not be time for that. [Laughter.] There would not be time to include all my sins. If we are to make a confession that can be terminated in a day and include very few sins, I must wait for the Senator from Maine to make it. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, apart from all questions of personal consistency, and which are of the smallest concern to me whatever they may be to other people, and I respectfully submit of very slight weight as an argument to the calm judgment of this body, is not the principle of the rule of the Senate against loading bills for the mere appropriation of money to carry out existing laws with all sorts of legislation, because it must be all sorts if you have any, according to the views of various gentlemen who have it to move, a sound principle? Nobody can say no to that; nobody has said no.

The Senator from Maine says this puts the Senate at a disadvantage in respect to the House of Representatives. I do not see it; and if it did it would merely be a disadvantage in not being able to perpetrate so much mischief as the House of Representatives may be able to perpetrate. But it is competent for the Senate of the United States, if it believes in the propriety of this principle, to reject every clause in an appropriation bill from the House of Represensatives that contains independent and general legislation, and to stick to that rejection, and to say to the House of Representatives, as we have often done, and with success, "You propose to appropriate money to carry on this Government; you propose to add to that a provision changing the laws; we are not able to see that the laws ought to be changed in that respect or on this bill; you therefore must take the responsibility of saying that you will not carry on the Government at all by appropriations of money under existing law unless a co-ordinate branch of the national legislature will assent to your views about importing into that bill new provisions of law;" and every time the House of Representatives in public opinion, which affects that body more suddenly than it does this, will go down. There is, therefore, no disadvantage in the just sense, and there is every advantage I believe for public interest, for purity in legislation, for consideration in legislation that changes your organic law, in sticking rigorously and with fidelity to this rule of the Senate, which prohibits us from going into amendments of this kind.

That is all I wish to say, Mr. President. I did not get up to defend my own consistency in the past if it needs defense, but only to invite every Senator to consider how much better it is to pass our appropriation bills as appropriation bills and nothing else, and to pass our other laws in the ordinary way as these propositions might have been passed, if they should turn out to be good measures, if the Senator from Maine had exercised his right on the first Monday in December to have introduced them as a bill, had them considered and reported by a committee, and taken the judgment of the Senate upon them.

I insist upon the point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it would be all very well if the practice were such as the Senator from Vermont intimates.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us make it so.

Mr. BLAINE. But it is entirely to the contrary. If the Senate will adopt a rule as rigid as the practice of the House is in another particular, then it will be effective. If the Senate infringes in the slightest degree upon what the House regards its constitutional right to originate bills of revenue, forthwith the bill comes back here and we have to sit and contemplate on the folly of sending it down.

Now, if we will pass a rule here saying peremptorily and without exception that an appropriation bill that comes here from the House with any legislation upon it shall immediately be returned to the House, that will be effective; but, as a matter of fact, the Senator from Vermont knows as well as I do that such is not the practice. Nearly every bill comes up here laden with legislation, some of it probably known to Senators, some of it probably put on at the request of Senators down there. I have known such cases, not in this Senate, of course, but in the earlier and better and purer days of the Republic, but within the memory of men still living, even within the time the Senator from Vermont has served in the Senate. When that comes here, if objection is made to it, it goes to the Appropriation Committee, and the courtesy of the Senate does not enable us to reject it, because that is the projét or proposition of the House. Now, it is mere nonsense for the Senator from Vermont to say that the attitude we hold on this question is in the least degree tending to prevent legislation on appropriation bills. I undertake to say that there has not been in twenty years—and I wish the Senator from Vermont to hear me on that point——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am hearing you all the time.

Mr. BLAINE. I undertake to say that in twenty years there has not been as much legislation on appropriation bills as has been put upon them since this rigid rule of the Senate, because the House has it all its own way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BLAINE. The House can propose; we can assent; and uniformly propositions have come from the House, legislative propositions on appropriation bills, uniformly so far as my observation goes—probably the Senator from Vermont is an exception, the yeas and nays will show that—but uniformly, I repeat that legislation is decided here upon the judgment of the Senate whether it is a good or whether it is bad legislation, and altogether regardless of the point of order.

Now, if the Senator from Vermont means to be consistent on this matter, if he means that this shall be an actual verity in legislation, let him propose a rule—he has proposed a great many—that shall make it imperative on the part of the Senate to send back with a respectful message every appropriation bill that comes here with a legislative provision upon it. Then we shall know precisely where we stand. As it is, I repeat the Senate is entirely at a disadvantage; it can only take that legislation which the House proposes. It has destroyed all power on its own part to propose any which it may think expedient.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in his seat.

Mr. WINDOM. He is here.

Mr. THURMAN. If he wishes a vote on this bill I will withhold the motion I propose to make.

Mr. WINDOM. Nothing would gratify the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations more. I think the discussion has closed and I have no doubt we can take the vote at once.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no more to say.

Mr. THURMAN. If the chairman asks for a vote now I shall not make the motion I rose to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say in answer to the Senator from Maine, and then I shall have done with this matter, that he does in my opinion injustice to the Senate when he says that every question of order is determined according to the opinion of individual Senators as to whether the thing proposed would be a right thing or not if it were not hampered with the question of order. That appears to me to be equivalent to saying that the minds of Senators are so incapable of performing their duties under the rule that they allow the prejudice of their wishes about a particular measure to lead them to violate the plain rule of the Senate. I have not such a poor opinion of Senators as to lead me to think that is a correct statement of the votes of Senators.

Mr. BLAINE. Then will the Senator from Vermont permit me to ask him how an exactly similar provision to that which he makes the point of order on was put last year on the West Point appropriation bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot tell because I do not remember anything about it.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator did remember enough about it to deny that he had voted for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I think was safe enough. I could speak for myself. I could deny.

Mr. BLAINE. That requires a good deal of memory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not much, not half as much as the Senator from Maine has. The Senator from Vermont has several other things to do besides watching every clause in an appropriation bill. Perhaps he is wrong in doing the other things; I am not going into that question.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not know anything occurred in the Senate that the Senator from Vermont did not watch.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken about that. I do not even watch the Senator from Maine, because I know it is perfectly safe to let him run wild. [Laughter.] Whether in a particular instance there may be a clause in an appropriation bill as the one to which the Senator from Maine refers, as to the method of administration or whatever it may be, that goes through without objection by unanimous consent or when Senators are doing something else in committee-room or elsewhere, I do not care.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator from Vermont have any recollection of the following provision on last year's Army bill:

> From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus or otherwise—

And the section running on?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have a very strong recollection of that.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator from Vermont not agree with me that that was decided on the vote in the Senate by the supposed political predilections and judgments of the Senate, and utterly regardless of the point of order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know for the simple reason that I was sick in my bed at my house when the thing was decided. That is the only answer I can give to that. The Senator must blame the providence that rules the universe——

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator was paired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will be good enough to hold on until I am through, it may be a benefit to him if it is not to me. If the providence that rules diseases more or less is to make a Senator responsible for not speaking to a point of order when he is sick in bed at home, then I must take the consequences of that; but the Senator from Maine ought to remember that when the question came up while the Senator from Vermont was able to be here, he with the Senator from Maine resisted the proposition as hard as he could.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, and the Senator from Vermont made a point of order against it and was opposed to the thing independent of the point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. But what I wanted to call the Senator's attention to was that when the vote came—if he was not here I am sure he was paired, and if he was not paired he was guilty of great dereliction, because it only got into the law by one vote, and if he was not paired, his one vote might have saved the question—when the vote came, the Senate decided it without the slightest regard whatever to whether it was apposite and appropriate legislation. They divided upon it on the party line as they do on everything that comes up, I repeat. If the Senator from Vermont wants further illustrations of this I could detain him until the sun sets to-day and rises to-morrow; and when he tells me the Senate here will reject House propositions of independent legislation on the ground of this rule of ours I point him to the practice against such a high theory as that. The practice of the Senate is directly the reverse. The honorable Senator from Ohio I think, and all on that side which he so ably leads, stood up for this part of the Army bill last year.

Mr. THURMAN. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now if both these Senators will be good enough to let me go on, it would be a great satisfaction to me. I cannot say how much the Senate has been demoralized since we have had the pleasure of the presence of my friend from Maine, [laughter,] but I do say that with the exception that I stated before of occasional gusts of prejudice and of passion, the Senate has without regard to party stood up for holding on to its rules; and I say in addition to that—for it is useless to go into a discussion of how much deviltry the Senate has perpetrated heretofore—the question is whether if we have been doing wrong heretofore we ought to do wrong now. That is the question.

Mr. BLAINE. No; the question is whether having——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will be good enough to wait until I am through.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment right there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not one single moment. [Laughter.] I know, Mr. President, how much better my speech would be if it was all made by the Senator from Maine; but the little part of it that I am making myself I would rather should stand by itself so that a discriminating public may see how much better what he says is than what I say, and if it was all put in I might get the credit of the whole performance. [Laughter.]

Now, to leave joking apart, for my friend from Maine well understands that it is the farthest from my purpose to get into any dispute with him about a matter of substance—the question is, not what the Senate has done heretofore, be it right or wrong, but whether sound principles of legislation are not embodied in this rule that I invoke on this point of order. That is what the question is; and if the Senate has been in the practice through party prejudice or any other kind of prejudice or misjudgment of violating this rule, I appeal to my honorable friend with considerable confidence that if the rule is a sound one the sooner we abandon that practice the better, without regard to party lines or wishes about particular amendments. That is all there is to it. The fact that this amendment is plainly in violation of the rule I believe is not disputed by even my honorable friend from Maine, although I do not know that that particular statement is justified.

Now I will yield to everybody, for I think I have said the last thing.

Mr. THURMAN. I am not at all disposed to interfere with this family quarrel or this encounter of wits; but as the Senator from Maine saw fit, without any reason that I can see, to allude to me and to say that I was leading the democracy on this side of the Senate into a violation of the rule to which he attaches so much importance, I wish to remind him, for though he was not in the Senate then I cannot suppose that it escaped his attention, that it is not very wonderful that we should not have paid much attention to this rule after the example set by the republican majority in this body in 1871, if I am not mistaken as to the year, in putting the famous election law on to an appropriation bill——

Mr. BLAINE. Of course against the wish of the Senator from Vermont that was done.

Mr. THURMAN. I will not undertake to say, because the Senator from Vermont can speak for himself.

Mr. BLAINE. I infer that of course it was.

Mr. THURMAN. And I am not fond of personal controversy.

Mr. BLAINE. What I was going to say, without any personal controversy, was this: I had the honor of serving in the House for some years while the Senator from Vermont preceded me in the Senate, and all the members of this body who were then in the House will remember that one of the things the House was continually ready to complain of was that the Senate would load the appropriation bills with very large amendments. They persisted in doing it. The Senator from Vermont seems to intimate that he had no part or lot in that; but he qualified that by saying that he had a very bad memory, and I am afraid the files of the Congressional Globe and of the RECORD itself will show that the Senator not only voted for these, but occasionally, to use a familiar phrase, took a large hand in framing them and in offering them.

I have here another one right on the naval appropriation bill of last year, an amendment far more radical than either one I have offered now, which was supported by the Senator. I do not think any division was made upon it, and wherever there was no division made upon it I am sure that my friend from Vermont was particeps criminis.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No.

Mr. BLAINE. If he was not here to object he was a consenting party, and when he did object it will be found, I think, that his strenuous points of order were most loudly and persistently enforced upon those provisions which, on the merits, he was opposed to, as in the case of the amendment to the Army bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Now, Mr. President, can we not have a vote on this bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The question, I believe, is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, in my mind there are half a dozen objections to that amendment. First, the bill, I notice, gives four or five pages of details of how the money appropriated for the Marine Corps shall be expended, a million dollars probably; and in one sweeping clause at the end it is now proposed that it shall all be at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. That is a radical change, and one that ought not to occur, in my judgment.

Another objection is that there has been no necessity shown for the amendment. There has been nothing coming from the Department that I know of, nothing coming from the committee that I have heard of, and in no way is the amendment intended for good as far as I know.

There is another question about it to me. I doubt very much whether it is in order if there is an objection made to it. A Senator near me asks that the amendment be read. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 567 it is proposed to add:

Provided, That if the amount appropriated for in items of the pay or quartermaster's department of the Marine Corps for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, shall prove insufficient for its purpose, the excess in any other item or items of the respective departments may, with the written consent of the Secretary of the Navy, be applied thereto: Provided, That the excess in the items of one department shall not be used for any insufficiency in the items of the other department, and that the total amount appropriated for the respective departments for said fiscal year shall not be exceeded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. While I believe it is subject to objection on a point of order, I will not make the objection now, but will wait to hear from the Senator from Massachusetts whether there is an actual necessity for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts understood what was asked, or certainly he would not treat it the way he does.

Mr. DAWES. I am not here undertaking to interfere with the Committee on Appropriations. This proposition was before the committee, and I was informed by a member of the committee that it was agreed to by them. He requested me to offer it because he could not very well attend to it himself. I went and submitted it to the chairman of the committee and he said it was proper, and it did not occur to him just then why they had not adopted it, but he consented to my offering it, which I did at the request of a member of the committee on the other side of the Chamber. I have had some experience in regard to appropriation bills, enough to make me dislike to have members who do not understand much about them interfere with them, and I was reluctant to do this, and I did it only after having consulted with the members of the committee on both sides, and offered the amendment at the request of a member of the committee on the other side.

The apparent necessity is this: a quantity of clothing of the Marine Corps has been destroyed, burned accidentally. The officers were afraid that the item for marine clothing was not quite sufficient here, and there were other items for that corps which they said would leave a little surplus, and following precisely the same words that are in the appropriation of last year for the Army, copying them in so many words, it was suggested that if the Secretary of the Navy consented in writing to take from a single item its balance to make up a deficiency in another item, no infringement would be made upon that wise provision of appropriations that a sum appropriated for one purpose shall not be perverted to another.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why do you put in the pay department?

Mr. DAWES. The pay department of the Marine Corps.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why put that in?

Mr. DAWES. I did not draw it; it was drawn in the committee-room of the Committee on Appropriations, and I offered it as I have said before. I shall not stand here undertaking to make up appropriation bills against the committee; and if no member of the committee supports the amendment the Senate will, I trust, vote it down; and, although I have had some sort of experience about appropriation bills, I will not undertake to help them make their appropriation bills again.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator will allow me a moment? I think the only object of this amendment is to save a deficiency for certain portions of the service mentioned in the amendment. There is enough money appropriated for the purposes; but there is a little balance here and another there, and a little deficiency at some other point and it was desired to avoid a deficiency bill and to give the Department the use of this fund at once. I care nothing about it, whether it is passed or not. A deficiency bill can supply it hereafter if there be any sort of objection to putting it here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the best way.

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of the Navy and some of the officers of the Marine Corps, I am not sure whether it was Major Goodloe or Colonel McCauley, handed me that paper which I handed to the chairman of the committee, who believed it could do no harm, being a very small matter. We were about to recommend it when it was lost in some way or other. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] perhaps asked to look at it. If it is any departure from the rule I do not care about it, but it is an extremely small matter, some $7,000 or $8,000 at most. It is to make two things meet so as not to call for a deficiency.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The offering of the amendment in the Senate to-day was the first I heard of it. Therefore there must be some mistake about its having originated in the committee-room by the committee. I have attended all the meetings of the committee. It may be a small thing or may not. Of course, if the Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator says it is, I must accept it as such; but I think a million dollars under that provision might be transferred from one object to another. I think there are about four pages of details of the appropriation of this money, and nearly a million dollars is covered probably. I take it, of course, there cannot be a transfer of anything like the full amount. If the members of the committee and the Senator from Massachusetts think it necessary, I shall withdraw all objection; but I believe that it is subject to the objection that it increases the amount, that it takes from one item and increases another, and therefore it is subject to a point of order. But as at least two members of the committee, especially the chairman and my friend from Kentucky, have said they have heard of the amendment before and believe it right, I shall withdraw all objection. But I think in principle it is wrong and ought not to be done.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from West Virginia is no more earnest than I have been heretofore, and am still, in confining appropriations to the specific object for which they are made. If there is a million dollars surplus in one particular item in, say, the pay department or the supply department of the Marine Corps——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator knows that this involves about a million.

Mr. DAWES. For the pay and the supply departments of the Marine Corps! If there is any surplus of a million appropriated in this bill for any one of these items, the bill does not come from the committee with that care and scrutiny which I have given the committee credit for. I suppose there are a few hundred dollars (and the Senator from Kentucky, who is better posted on it than I am, so assures me) that may be taken in this way, just precisely as was done in the Army bill last year and put in under the eagle eye of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

I wish, however, Mr. President, to relieve the Senator from all anxiety caused by my rashly rushing into this bill of naval appropriation, and I therefore respectfully ask leave of the Senate to withdraw an amendment which I rashly proposed to offer at the suggestion of a member of the committee to relieve them of a little deficiency hereafter. If the Senate will consent I will withdraw it. I have not the slightest desire to push it. No desire on my part was inspired by the request of the committee that I should offer it rather than themselves.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator has not taken offense at anything I have said.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was only the principle I thought was wrong; and that I now state to the Senator. I have not the least objection to him or any other Senator offering an amendment. He has a perfect right to do so. But I did state that the first I heard of it was to-day when it was offered in the Senate.

It appears to be right so far as the Senators who have looked into it are concerned. I have not examined it. I shall not insist upon objecting to it; but I now say that all future transfers of this kind I shall be particular in trying to prevent. I believe the principle a wrong one and it ought not to go out, and if it was in last year's bill it was wrongly there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought it was withdrawn by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He said he would withdraw it if the Senate gave its consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not require any consent; no yeas and nays have been ordered on it.

Mr. DAWES. I insist on my right to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. Cannot the vote now be taken on the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I hope that withdrawal will operate as a warning hereafter to all members of the Senate not to meddle with the appropriation bills.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask leave now to introduce a bill embracing the provisions I tried to get on the naval bill, and which everybody is in favor of.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1684) to regulate promotion in the Navy, and for other purposes; and it was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions I had the honor to offer in regard to the constitutional amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I wish to have a bill referred first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the patent bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The patent bill does not come up by law. That bill was displaced yesterday by the naval bill going over as unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed otherwise at the desk, that the patent bill was laid aside temporarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was laid aside yesterday temporarily, and this other bill came over as unfinished business. The patent bill therefore has lost its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The patent bill is the regular order, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I move to postpone the present and all prior orders and take up the resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to lay aside the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the resolutions he has indicated.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator from Ohio to give way to a motion for an executive session.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us try an adjournment first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 23, noes 20.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATTHEWS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD.]

Mr. PADDOCK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] who is absent on account of illness, is paired on all political questions, as he tells me, with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] Mr. TELLER, and Mr. KIRKWOOD, and Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin are paired with certain Senators whose names I have in my desk, upon all political questions.

Mr. GARLAND, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I suppose I have voted improperly, as I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] who is now absent. If this is a political question, I ask leave to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas withdraws his vote.

Mr. BUTLER. I am in the same predicament. I did not suppose a question of adjournment was a political question, and therefore I voted "yea;" but if it is to be a political question, of course I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.]

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] and my colleague [Mr. COKE] are paired. I am requested to announce that fact.

Mr. MERRIMON. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] As this is treated as a political question, I shall not vote.

Several SENATORS. It is not political.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas. If the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber think this is a political question, I feel constrained to keep my pair, but I hear one gentleman on the other side of the Chamber say that he does not regard this as a political question at all, and he has voted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did the Senator address himself to me?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas when any political associate of his shall request me to do it on a political question. If this is treated as a political question, I am ready to observe that pair, but I find there is a difference of opinion about that. One gentleman on the other side of the House has suggested that he does not regard it as a political question, and has voted for the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly cannot interfere in a question of personal pairs between the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Kansas; but a Senator of one party moved to take up what may be regarded as a political question; a prominent Senator of another party moved immediately to adjourn, and thereupon the parties have apparently divided pretty nearly upon equal lines. I have nothing to advise of course on the question. Everybody must judge for himself.

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe I shall decline to vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] if his colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] left with him any statement as to his pair. I remember that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] before he started for Texas asked me to pair with him upon a specific question; I am not inclined to think that anything was said about political questions; but if the Senator from Maine has left a statement, or if he understood that I was paired with him upon political questions, I shall certainly observe it.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to state that I have a memorandum given me by Senator BAYARD that he and the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] were paired on all political questions and they both went down to Texas together.

Mr. BLAINE. I was going to say that I knew nothing whatever about it.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. BAYARD said he was paired with some other gentleman on one particular question.

Mr. BAILEY. This question seems to take a political form, and as such I decline to vote. I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] on all political questions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say in correspondence with the statement of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that I have been informed that Senator HAMLIN and Senator BAYARD, who have both gone together, are paired on political questions, so that the Senator from Tennessee appears to be free from it.

Mr. WITHERS. I am aware of it. I was present when the arrangement was made.

Mr. CHAFFEE, (who had voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] on political questions. It did not appear to me that a question of adjournment could be so regarded, and I voted; but as it is so regarded, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BOOTH. As explanation seems to be in order, I will say that I have voted in favor of the motion to adjourn because I understood the motion of the Senator from Vermont would supersede the patent bill, and I consider that practical legislation. However important the resolutions may be, it is at least of equal importance, and paramount in my mind to-day.

The Secretary read the list of yeas and nays.

Mr. BAILEY. I announced a moment ago that I had paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] on all political questions; and as this question seemed to take a political shape, for that reason I withdrew my vote; but I notice that the Clerk has recorded it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's vote will be withdrawn.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—24.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. FREEMAN. I desire to ask a correction of the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings. When I asked permission to record my vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to lay on the table the motion to reconsider made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I stated that if permitted to vote I would vote in the negative. In the RECORD I am represented as saying directly the contrary—that I would vote in the affirmative. I would like to have that correction made.

The SPEAKER. As some criticisms have been made in reference to the roll-call to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FREEMAN] refers, the Chair will state that a critical examination shows, what the Chair knew at the time, that the second roll-call which was taken did not exhibit any change in the result as appearing by the first roll-call. In the first list, down to the letter C, those members voting in the affirmative were marked in the negative, and those voting in the negative were marked in the affirmative; but the result of the vote was not changed upon the second roll-call. The Chair desires to say further, in his own behalf, that the error was discovered by reason of the caution of the Chair in sending down to the floor to have some member object to dispensing with the reading of names.

REMOVAL OF INDIAN TRIBES, ETC.

Mr. SCALES, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, as a substitute for a bill heretofore referred to that committee, a bill (H. R. No. 6139) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Warm Spring, Umatilla, Chippewa, Ute, and certain other tribes of Indians in the United States for the extinguishment of their title to lands now occupied by them, and for their removal to and consolidation upon certain other reservations established by law; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

CURRENCY.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6140) to define and prescribe the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury in certain cases, and for other kindred purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES IN HONOR OF PROFESSOR HENRY.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I submit a resolution upon which I ask immediate action.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the memorial exercises in honor of Professor Henry, held in the Hall of the House of Representatives on the 16th of January, 1879, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that 15,000 extra copies of the same be printed in a memorial volume, together with such articles as may be furnished by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, 7,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the previous question upon the adoption of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the resolution does not designate the proper proportion of copies as between the Senate and the House. The House ought to have four times as many as the Senate.

Mr. BURCHARD. Should not the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not suppose that the expense contemplated in the resolution would reach $500; but if it would, then under the law the resolution must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. This is precisely similar to the resolution adopted in the case of the memorial exercises of Professor Morse.

The SPEAKER. Of course the printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not taken into consideration in determining this question of expense. The Chair is not advised whether these 15,000 extra copies to be published in book-form would cost $500. If they would, then, under the requirement of the law, the resolution must be referred to the Committee on Printing. The Chair is advised it would cost over $500, and therefore it had better go to the Committee on Printing under the law. That committee has a right to report at any time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Let it take that reference.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Printing.

COMPANY COOKS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 1242) to repeal section 1233 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides for the repeal of section 1233 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BRIGHT. Had not the section better be read, so that we may know what is to be repealed?

Mr. BANNING. I send up a copy of the Revised Statutes and ask the Clerk to read section 1233.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cooks shall be detailed, in turn, from the privates of each company of troops in the service of the United States, at the rate of one cook for each company numbering less than thirty men, and two cooks for each company numbering more than thirty men; and they shall serve on each detail ten days.

Mr. McCOOK. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interpose any objection to the passage of this bill, but I think the chairman of the Military Committee ought to make some explanation so we may understand exactly what will be its effect.

Mr. BANNING. I will say in one word that the Committee on Military Affairs have agreed to this unanimously. Under the law at present, cooks have to be detailed every ten days. It has been found this gives very bad cooks to the Army, and that in about every ten days it destroys the suit of clothes of the cook. Therefore it has been recommended by Army officers, by the General of the Army, by the Surgeon-General of the Army, by the Secretary of War, by the Military Committee of the Senate, and by the Military Committee of the House, of which the gentleman from New York is a member, that this bill be passed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF COIN AND BULLION.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6145) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the expense of the transportation of coin and bullion $60,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided this appropriation be made available on and after the passage of this act, and the charges for the transportation of gold coin from San Francisco to New York shall not exceed one quarter of 1 per cent., and for the transportation of silver 1 per cent., and for intermediate points at proportionate rates corresponding to the distance.

To meet the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives, to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House, the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available after the passage of the act.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I will briefly explain the bill. It is important that it should go through now, because on one clause depend vital and critical operations of the Treasury, and upon the remaining clause depends the working of certain committees of this House now "hung up" for want of funds.

The first provision of the bill gives to the Secretary of the Treasury an appropriation for transporting gold and silver bullion from the mints and assay offices to the East, where it may be needed and paid out.

Under section 3545 of the Revised Statutes the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to keep in mints and assay offices such amount of public money or bullion as he shall judge convenient and necessary to pay depositors of bullion at said mints and assay offices the value thereof in coin or bars. By section 254 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in certain cases to issue certificates representing coin in the Treasury in payment of deposits of bullion. By the statute of last winter, which will be found on pages 191–2 of the acts of last session, it is declared that the provisions of section 3545 shall apply hereafter to mints and assay offices, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue, as far as he may deem it proper and expedient in payment of deposits of bullion in mints and assay offices, certificates representing coin in the Treasury, to be issued under the provisions of section 254. So when this is done it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the control of this bullion from the time of its deposit for coinage. Instead of being paid back, this act "authorizes," not "directs," the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to issue coin certificates, and, of course, the coin has to be transported from the mints to the eastern subtreasuries, where it will be paid out when needed.

That transportation of course is an item of expense to the Government. It is an additional item from what before occurred because of this change authorized by the act of last winter. The Secretary might undoubtedly in his discretion have disregarded this act, and instead of taking the control of this gold which had been deposited in mints and assay offices, might have left it there to be paid in coin to depositors; but if he had done that he would not have obtained the control he desired in the process of resumption of the large coinage coming in.

So, acting upon that discretionary authority given to him by the statute of last winter, the Secretary of the Treasury has issued from time to time coin certificates. Nobody will dispute his right to do that. Some question may possibly be raised as to the prudence or wisdom of that course. I have no doubt about it myself. I have no doubt that it was a wise thing to do to incur this extra expense, not large, for the purpose of giving the Secretary the control where most needed of this coin. That is the ground on which the appropriation is asked for.

Now, it will be noticed in the bill that there is a provision which limits the charges which shall be made by certain express companies for the transportation of this gold. The Secretary has found that certain express companies connected with and controlled by the Pacific Railroad Companies have been disposed to exact and have exacted high rates, more than the eastern companies have done; they have claimed the money and have received it. And it cannot be offset in the account with the Pacific Railroad Companies, because these express companies, although actually in fact controlled by the railroad companies, are technically express companies and do not come under the provisions applicable to the accounts of the railroad companies. The Secretary has found that these companies will charge a larger sum for transporting from Ogden to Omaha than from Omaha to New York. It is provided that the aggregate rate shall not exceed two and a half mills per dollar for gold, or 1 per cent. for silver from San Francisco to New York, and proportionate rates for shorter distances along the line.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine whether this limitation upon the charges for transportation applies to the assay offices at Helena and Boisé as well as the others? I notice that the language of the bill is between "San Francisco and New York and intermediate points." Now, Helena is four hundred and fifty miles north of the line of the road, and Denver over one hundred and sixty miles south. Are these offices embraced in the terms of this bill?

Mr. HALE. I asked the same question and found the construction that will be given at the Department. At all those branch offices between the Pacific and Atlantic the rates will be fixed proportionately according to what is fixed here, whether on the direct line or not. The rate is fixed on the whole distance from San Francisco to New York, and the rates for shorter distances will be fixed proportionately to that.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I asked the question because a prominent express company, Wells, Fargo & Co., after reaping a rich harvest from our Montana miners for a number of years, opposed the passage through Congress of laws to allow us to deposit our bullion at the United States assay offices on the same terms as the more favored citizens of the Republic who live in the great commercial centers and are provided with mint facilities which are denied to the producers of bullion. After passing three times through this House and being smothered in the other, justice was finally secured, and Congress by law directed the Secretary to issue coin certificates for and to purchase our bullion. In attempting to carry out the law, the Secretary found himself confronted by exorbitant demands from the express company, $21 per thousand for gold and $36 per thousand for silver, and, as Congress had provided him with no transportation fund, he was obliged to deduct the cost of transportation from the depositors of bullion, which the law did not contemplate. I hope that a transportation fund will be furnished and the Secretary enabled to curb the rapacity of express companies.

Mr. HALE. And this bill is intended to protect the Treasury.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But this is deducted from the depositors of bullion.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Oh, no!

Mr. WADDELL. Will the gentleman from Maine permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask the question for information. Are not large quantities of coin put up in four-pound packages and packed in iron safes now transported from the Pacific coast in the postal-cars?

Mr. HALE. I was coming to that. Of course the limitations put upon this bill to protect the Treasury from the exactions of express companies cannot be carried out unless both sides agree. If the express companies round up and say, "We will not carry at those low rates," then the Secretary proposes to go to the mails; he will then transport this by mail, and the rates fixed here are the rates that will be covered by the cost of transporting by mail in postal cars or otherwise. The companies are given the benefit if they choose to transport this coin of transporting at the same rate as the Government can in its mail cars.

The other provision of the bill increases the contingent fund of the House $40,000. That has become necessary because the contingent fund is exhausted. Some of the expenses of the different committees that have gone off lately upon their mournful errands to the different States I believe are now remaining unpaid. There are other committees and subcommittees of the House that have been appointed to investigate certain matters in different cities of the United States, and they cannot proceed because there is no money. The investigation that yesterday was set on foot by the House cannot, I believe, move unless the contingent fund is replenished. It was thought that the sum here was not too large. I do not think it is large enough. I think the Clerk will be obliged before the session is closed to come here and ask, it may be, as much more money as is provided here; that the $40,000 will be too little. But at present the estimate is that $40,000 will do. That amount will at any rate cover immediate wants.

Mr. DUNNELL. Why is this appropriation from the contingent fund of the House made a part of this bill?

Mr. HALE. Because the Committee on Appropriations always reports the appropriations for the different branches of the service of the House. We generally appropriate them in a regular bill, but this is in the nature of a deficiency.

Mr. DUNNELL. The first section of this bill appropriates money to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury for a specific purpose indicated in the title of the bill, but in the second section, as if to cover up that fact, there comes in an appropriation of $40,000 as a contingency of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE. I do not see how the gentleman can say that I have covered that up, because I have volunteered an explanation. The House itself and the committee may put a half dozen other things in an appropriation bill and the title show nothing.

Mr. DUNNELL. In looking over the index of bills passed at this session no one could suppose that in this bill there was an appropriation for contingent expenses of the House.

Mr. HALE. Neither did any one ever imagine that the titles of the different appropriation bills cover the different items in them.

Mr. DUNNELL. The Indian appropriation bill would suggest the fact that the items of the bill were for the Indian service.

Mr. HALE. This is an appropriation to pay the expenses of certain committees of the House, and is included in the title words "and for other purposes."

Mr. DUNNELL. The title does not indicate that.

Mr. HALE. It may not to the gentleman's mind, but it puts him on search for "other things."

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? This discussion shows that there may be a difference of opinion as to the first appropriation to the Secretary of the Treasury. As to the second there can be no doubt, either in the House or in the Senate. There are two or three committees which are waiting to go upon their duties and cannot do so until their expenses are provided for. I would suggest to the gentleman that he divide the two sections into two bills. Nobody in the House would object to the last section of the bill, and certainly no one in the Senate would upon the other. They may come to a discussion and reference to a committee, and that will lead to a delay if you put the two items together.

Mr. HALE. I certainly should not be willing to follow the course suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, because while I can understand that some question may be raised about the first section, indeed I have been notified that it would be raised about the course the Secretary has pursued, I cannot consent to divide the bill or delay the progress of the first section, because it is just as necessary to the operations of the Treasury Department, in the business which has been set on foot and is now going on, as are the provisions for the committees of this House, for whom the other appropriation is required.

The Committee on Appropriations reported this bill through me because both of these items are in the nature of pressing emergencies, and the necessity of the case requires each one of them; one of the Treasury Department and the other of the House of Representatives, and the needs of the one are as great as the needs of the other.

The transportation of this gold coin from the mints and assay offices to the East is necessary, and surely the gentleman would not object to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not object to either item, but I do not know but that some one else will object. Why should you join the two together so as to let the one delay the other. If there are two emergencies let each one stand upon its own bottom.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman knows the difficulty of multiplying appropriation bills. The items of an appropriation bill must necessarily be multifarious.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all; because the ordinary appropriation bill does not take effect immediately, whereas this is to take effect at once. I only speak in reference to the exigencies of the House of Representatives, which is to expire on the 4th of March, while the Treasury is likely to live on forever, or until it is depleted.

Mr. HALE. It is because of the deficiency that I am pushing this bill now. It will not do to wait and let either item go into another bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Then put the items into separate bills.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman think that investigating committees will not live forever?

Mr. BUTLER. There will be new investigations.

Mr. HALE. I was notified that some question would be raised about what the Secretary has done, but I did not know that any gentleman would oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. HUBBELL. Does this transportation apply to gold bullion as well as coin?

Mr. HALE. That is all in the Revised Statutes. If the gentleman will read section 3545 and section 254 of the Revised Statutes he will find provisions as to gold bullion and certificates therefor which necessitate transportation.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I notice that this bill provides that the rate for the transportation of gold bullion is not to exceed ½ of 1 per cent. Now, I believe that it takes something over $200 in gold to make a pound, and that would be at the rate of fifty cents per pound or over. I ask the gentleman if it is not true that gold bullion is now transported in the mails of the United States at the rate of one cent an ounce or sixteen cents per pound, and whether it is proper for us to make an appropriation to pay over fifty cents per pound when they are carrying for private individuals at the rate of sixteen cents per pound?

Mr. HALE. Allow me to explain. If the Government has to go into this business to any large extent it must not simply send packages of four pounds' weight and trust to the accidents of the mail, but it must exercise some care over the packages; it must put up in larger quantities this gold coin and send messengers or guards with the cars.

The Secretary of the Treasury has made a calculation as to what the transportation of a car-load of coin will cost, and has found that it will be just about what he has fixed here as the rate which he is willing to pay these express companies. I do not know but what if packages were sent of different weights—four pounds in one package, twelve pounds in another package, twenty-four in another, and sixty pounds in another, the different packages simply going along with the mail-bags—they would go cheaper than the rates here proposed. But I do not suppose the Secretary would be willing to send any large amount of coin in that way. He has reckoned what the cost would be if the packages were aggregated and a guard sent with them for security, saving other expenses which the express companies now assume.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one other question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The statistics show that of the great many hundred valuable packages carried in the mails during the last twelve months there has been lost, as I recollect now, but ten of them. Under the system of registration I think it is almost absolutely safe to use the mails for this purpose. I would suggest to the gentleman that perhaps it would be better to so amend the law as to allow the utilizing of mail transportation for packages of larger size than four pounds when the service is done for the Government, and then through the system of registration it can be done with safety.

Mr. HALE. Of course if anything of that kind is required and is desirable it should come in due time from the proper committee, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which the gentleman himself is a member.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. EDEN. I understand that gold bullion is now carried in the mails. If that is practicable, why, then, is it not practicable to carry silver bullion in the same manner?

Mr. HALE. The gentleman can see, of course, that silver of the same value being so much heavier than gold, it would be a more difficult matter to transport it by mail. A large amount to be transported by mail would soon clog the mails, and the only way to do it, if it is to be transported by mail, would be to carry it by the car-load rather than in small packages.

Mr. EDEN. Can it not be done cheaper in that way than the express companies carry it?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly it could be carried cheaper than the express companies now carry it, but not cheaper in large quantities than the rates fixed by this bill. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] is mistaken in saying that coin could not be transported cheaper by mail than the rates prescribed in this bill. It could undoubtedly be done cheaper by mail. But there is involved the question of insurance, which is a very serious matter when you recollect that a car-load of gold would be worth several millions of dollars.

The express companies undertake to insure. While this specie has been coming through the mail the Secretary of the Treasury has been compelled to provide military guards to protect it. I have no doubt that even with the guard it is cheaper to carry it by mail. Nevertheless it is perhaps without warrant of law, but nobody will arraign the Secretary for the exercise of such a discretion as that; the risk is too great.

I wish to say that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has carefully and correctly stated the provisions of law which apply to this case. The Secretary has exercised a discretion in regard to paying for bullion deposited in the mints and assay offices for which coin certificates have been given, a discretion confided to him by law. It is in reference to the exercise of that discretion that I take exception to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine. He thinks that the discretion has been wisely exercised; I think it has been an unnecessary expenditure of the public money.

It is necessary to recall the attention of this House briefly to the history of the provisions of law in regard to the coinage of gold and silver. Originally there was a mint charge of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent. for the coinage of gold. By the resumption law of January, 1875, this mint charge was abolished, so that the holder of gold bullion could go to the mint or to the assay office in New York, deposit his bullion, and receive a coin certificate, which being receivable for duties was equivalent to gold coin. That was the first step.

Then that provision of law was enlarged so as to apply to all the mints and assay offices of the United States, so that it became possible for any holder of gold bullion to take his bullion to the mints and assay offices and not only get his coin free of charge for coinage, but in addition to that to obtain a coin certificate which was good for coin in the city of New York, thereby saving the cost of transportation of the coin, if it should become necessary to send it from the East to the West, or vice versa.

It was in a provision of the sundry civil appropriation bill of last year that this additional concession to the holders of gold bullion was made. That provision did not originate with the Committee on Appropriations; it originated in the House. The gentleman from Colorado whom I see now standing before me [Mr. PATTERSON] offered an amendment applying to the mint at Denver, which was adopted, and which provision, I believe, was subsequently enlarged by the Senate so as to apply to all the mints and assay offices of the United States.

When that amendment was offered, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] said:

I would ask the gentleman if any additional expenditure is required by that amendment. The charges upon depositors, I suppose, will be deducted from the expenses?

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations undoubtedly confused in his own mind gold coin with gold bullion which was to be parted. There is no charge on gold coin. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] replied:

The gentleman asks me if any additional expenditure is required by the amendment. On the contrary, it will result, I think, in a reduction of the expenditures, because it will produce a new revenue; and this new revenue is used for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the mint.

I infer also that the gentleman from Colorado misunderstood the application of the amendment, for instead of producing any new revenue, it has compelled the Secretary of the Treasury to come to this House and ask for an additional appropriation of $60,000 for this year and $150,000 for next year.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. The amendment which I offered a year ago is much broader in extent than the few lines which the gentleman has quoted. But with reference to the additional cost, I would state that certainly no additional cost has been imposed upon the Government by the amendment; because at the mint in Denver the cost of transportation is deducted from the market value of the gold, and the party bringing his bullion to the mint for sale receives from the Government only its market value in gold coin less the cost of transportation.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. To what point?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. To whatever point the Government sees fit to transport it—to Philadelphia, to New York, or elsewhere. Hence there can be no additional burden imposed upon the Government by the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I beg to say that the gentleman is quite in error as to the operation of the law. The law is clear and explicit in the provision that whoever brings bullion to the Treasury shall have without charge, at the rate of 25.8 grains to the dollar, coin certificates which are receivable for customs dues in any port of the country.

Mr. MAGINNIS. No doubt that is the law; but certainly the gentleman from Colorado correctly states the practice; for at the assay office at Helena the Secretary deducts $21 per thousand as the transportation charge on gold, and $36 per thousand on silver.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. This is done, too, under instructions signed by the Secretary of the Treasury which were duly published in the public prints; so that there can be no mistake whatever about the proposition.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am not disposed to dispute in regard to the regulations of the Department; I do not know what they are. I think it very likely that the Department does make these charges of $21 per thousand on gold and $36 on silver, as stated by the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.] But I say that there is no warrant of law for such a charge; and I do not know to what fund any such charge can be appropriated. It does not belong to the expenses of transportation; otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury would not come to this House and ask us to make an appropriation for that purpose. It must go somewhere else.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to know whether any appropriation has ever been required to transport the Government greenbacks? [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Yes, every year.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The Government treats the greenback just as it does the gold: it fabricates both for nothing.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I think that in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury I should make one statement which will occupy but a moment. At the mint in Denver (and I suppose the case is the same at Helena) the Government does not issue coin certificates for gold bullion. It pays for the gold in cash—either in silver dollars or in legal-tender currency; and it deducts from the cash that is paid to the owner of the bullion the cost of transportation, there being no coin certificates issued. If coin certificates were issued, I presume the Secretary of the Treasury would be compelled to live up to the law, and to issue the certificates, dollar for dollar, computing each dollar according to the regulation number of grains.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] will go on and finish what he has to say, because I wish to bring this matter to a conclusion. The hour is rapidly running, and other matters are pressing. I do not wish to take too much time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will close in one or two minutes.

Mr. HALE. Take your own time.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, what I want mainly to say is that in no country of the world except the United States is bullion coined free for the depositor. To get the gold coin without charge for coinage, is concession enough. When a man receives his coin in exchange for bullion, why should this Government take upon itself the cost of transportation, known among merchants as the exchange between different places, so that a depositor of bullion in San Francisco or Denver may draw the gold in New York or Philadelphia? When the Government has delivered the gold coin to the depositor at the place of deposit, it has not only discharged its full duty, but it has done all that is necessary in order to make that coin available for the purposes of commerce.

The gentleman from Maine said the Secretary of the Treasury thought it desirable to control the gold coin of the country in order that he might put it where the place of redemption of legal-tender notes should be. Mr. Speaker, the place where gold coin should be is beyond the power of the Secretary of the Treasury; it is beyond the power of this Congress or of any Congress whatever. Money seeks the place where it is wanted, and if it is worth more in New York than in San Francisco it will go there, and if it is worth more in San Francisco than in New York it should stay there, and the Secretary of the Treasury should not exercise any discretion which even for a day is intended to frustrate and nullify the laws of trade. And what I have to say to the House is this: this provision of the statute which crept into the bill during the last session under misapprehension should be promptly repealed, and I only regret the Committee on Appropriations did not report a repeal of that statute. The truth is, all we should do is to coin the bullion and give the depositor the amount of coin it represents. Beyond that we should not go one step. After it is coined the money will distribute itself freely without cost to the Government, and any attempt to interfere with its natural flow will only result in mischief and can be productive of no good whatever.

Mr. HALE. Only one word in reply, Mr. Speaker, and then I will call for the previous question. It makes no difference whether it is a fact or not that the Secretary of the Treasury deducts at the time he receives the bullion the amount necessary to pay for its transportation. Whether he deducts from what he pays over in certain cases or not I do not care; but it is true that he does need in transporting it afterward an appropriation by Congress to pay the expense. There is no fund to pay for that transportation. Such appropriation is under the control of Congress, and must be made here, and that is the reason this bill has been reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

I do not understand that anybody claims—the gentleman from New York does not claim—the Secretary has exercised any power wrongfully in this regard.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Not wrongfully, but unwisely.

Mr. HALE. Yes; the gentleman thinks if he had been in the place of the Secretary he would not have done it. Yet the Secretary in the direction he has taken—and it is precisely the direction aimed at by the gentleman from New York himself on the great question of resumption—has transported the coin to the East where it is needed, and where everybody knows it is wanted, and is being paid out. The Secretary therefore is confronted with the necessity of asking for an appropriation from Congress to carry on this transportation for the rest of the year; and that, sir, is all there is of it. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend the title of the bill by striking out the words "for other purposes" and in lieu thereof inserting "to appropriate $40,000 for miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives."

Mr HALE. That is all right.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have printed as part of the discussion the letters which I send up.

There was no ojection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The letters are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 10, 1878.

SIR: I have to call the attention of your committee to the provisions of the act of June 8, 1878, (20 Statutes, 102,) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to constitute any superintendent of a mint or assayer of any assay office an assistant treasurer of the United States to receive coin or bullion on deposit; and, also, to section 3545 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of June 19, 1878, (20 Statutes, 191, 192,) providing for a bullion fund for the purchase of bullion by mints and assay offices to enable returns to be made to depositors with as little delay as possible.

While these provisions of law were intended to secure to the producers of bullion more speedy payment, therefore it is believed they will bring into the mints and Treasury the great body of the precious metals mined in the United States, and will tend greatly to the easy and steady supply of bullion for coinage.

As stated in my annual report, page 24, the burden of transporting this coin and bullion thus received is thrown by law upon the Government, and to meet in part the expense of such transportation the regulations under the act last mentioned provide a charge against the depositors of an amount sufficient to pay the transportation to the nearest or most convenient mint, leaving to the Government the expense of transportation from the mints to such Treasury offices as may be found necessary to meet the demands for disbursement.

To meet this latter expense I have to ask an additional appropriation for transportation of coin and bullion for the present current year of $60,000. In this connection your attention is called to the suggestion made in my annual report that the rate for shipping this coin over the Pacific Railroads be prescribed by Congress, the proceeds to form a part of the sinking funds of such roads.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
January 8, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to a matter which I am well convinced should receive official correction.

The usage has been to send Government securities, currency, &c., by the Adams Express Company to be forwarded through other express companies outside of territory covered by contract, and the result has been that the most exorbitant and irregular rates have been fixed at the caprice of such companies and to the injury of the United States.

An examination of vouchers herewith transmitted will show that the charges are excessive, and, I am inclined to the opinion, are without authority of law, so far as the charges of the Union Pacific Railroad Express are concerned. It will be seen that two express companies, namely, "The Adams" and "The American," charge $3.60 for a package containing $6,000 from Washington to Omaha, whereas the Union Pacific Railroad Company's express charges $15 on the same amount from Omaha to Ogden, Utah, and the Wells Fargo & Co.'s Express charges $36 from Ogden to Portland, Oregon.

The following will show the relative charges to Omaha and from Omaha west:

Amount.	Charges to Omaha.	From Omaha west.
$361,000	$217 20	$902 50
100,650	60 60	251 60
60,000	36 60	390 00
12,000	7 20	30 00
6,000	3 60	51 00
2,000	1 20	12 60
2,000	1 20	5 00

It will be observed that in some cases over ten times the amount is charged for transportation beyond Omaha as is charged to that point, while in the aggregate fully five times as much is charged; and nearly one-half of this excessive charge is made upon a railroad line which was built by Government subsidy under provisions which are entirely ignored by the corporation when organizing an express agency over its lines.

I respectfully ask instructions in relation to audit of these accounts already rendered, and would recommend that, unless lower rates can be secured, all moneys hereafter sent west of Omaha should be sent by registered mail, even if the Government should pay insurance.

The fact that the Post-Office Department transports nearly $100,000,000 annually without loss would strongly suggest this method when rates of transportation asked are excessive.

The great disproportion of payment demanded to actual service rendered constrains me to report these cases to you for instructions; and I am more inclined to call your attention to the matter from the fact that you refer to the same subject in your annual report, (page 24,) and arrive at the conclusion that, to fix rates, further legislation is needed.

Awaiting your instructions in the matter of these accounts, I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. M. REYNOLDS, Auditor.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

REDUCTION OF EXPENSE OF PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a bill (H. R. No. 6142) to reduce the expense of the public printing and binding, and for other purposes, and to move the bill be printed and recommitted.

Mr. CONGER. Has that committee the right to report at any time?

Mr. SINGLETON. The Committee on Printing has the right to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. But they have not the right to report general legislation at any time. They have the right to report resolutions referred to them.

Mr. SINGLETON. This is a subject which was presented and referred to that committee.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Committee on Printing can report in reference to current business at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Printing has no more right than any other committee.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Speaker did not hear what I said. I said that they have no right to report at any time except on current business, and not in reference to general legislation.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair has decided.

Mr. COX, of New York. It has been so decided before very often.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask by unanimous consent that I may have an hour on Saturday next for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CONGER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the consideration of the bill at the time stated.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will, then, withdraw the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better let the matter remain as it is, for then the bill will be ordered to be printed and it will be in the exact situation it would be if the gentleman should withdraw it.

Mr. SINGLETON. Can I call it up after it is printed at any time?

The SPEAKER. Only when the committee is called for reports in its regular order. It might be taken up and considered under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I am opposed to its having any rights which it does not possess under the rules.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, and to move that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in.

Mr. CONGER. Let them be read.

Mr. SPARKS. There are a great many of them. The Committee on Appropriations have unanimously instructed me to make this report.

Mr. CONGER. Sometimes there are very excellent Senate amendments which we might like to adopt.

Mr. SPARKS. I have no objection to their being read, but it will take considerable time.

Mr. CONGER. The report being a unanimous one from the Committee on Appropriations, I will not insist on the reading of the amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I now insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, which commences at thirty minutes past one o'clock, and the business before the House is the bill reported from the Committee on War Claims, which was under consideration at the time the morning hour expired yesterday.

Mr. ACKLEN. I desire to ask the Chair whether the unfinished business of the morning hour which the House refused to consider yesterday does not now come up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. It does not; but after the disposition of the bill under consideration, the unfinished business which the House refused to consider yesterday would come up again. The House on yesterday refused to consider the report and it is still unfinished business in the morning hour. Then the House proceeded to the consideration of other subjects; and the moment this bill is disposed of the gentleman from Louisiana can test the sense of the House again.

Mr. ACKLEN. Then, as I understand the decision of the Chair, the present unfinished business takes precedence of the former unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It does. The Chair may also state that the vote against the gentleman's bill yesterday under ordinary circumstances would be considered an unfavorable decision on the part of the House.

Mr. ACKLEN. The failure of the House to consider it yesterday does not necessarily imply that the House will not consider it to-day.

The SPEAKER. The House very properly has the right under the rule in almost all cases—there are exceptional cases of course—to say by a majority whether it will proceed with the consideration of any question or not.

Mr. ACKLEN. Then I understand the Chair to rule that as soon as the present business is disposed of the other comes up as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Louisiana.

M. BARRON AND H. P. AND W. GORMAN.

The House resumed as the unfinished business of the morning hour the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6131) for the relief of Maggie Barron and Henry P. Gorman and Walter Gorman.

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.]

Mr. EDEN. The only apology that I make for occupying any time whatever in the discussion of this bill is that I desire to correct some erroneous impressions that seem to prevail in the House in reference to the action of the Committee on War Claims. This bill proposes to give a hearing in the Court of Claims to certain heirs of a gentleman who resided, I believe, in the State of Mississippi during the war, and who died in 1868 or 1869. The bill embraces only that class of claims of which the commissioners of claims have had jurisdiction in the insurrectionary States ever since the 3d of March, 1871.

The Committee on War Claims have not adopted a rule and do not intend to adopt a rule to remove the bar of the statute of limitations in every case where parties entitled to relief under that act did not file their claims within two years, but only in such cases as the claimants can satisfy the committee that they were prevented from some cause over which they had no control from filing their claims within the two years.

This claim is on behalf of parties all of whom were minors during the war, and all of whom but one I believe were minors at the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1871. I repeat that the Committee on War Claims has in no instance within my knowledge reported a bill to this House to give a hearing to any person who had a right to a hearing before the commissioners of claims, and who failed to assert that right, unless they had presented some good and sufficient reason to the committee for taking such action.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDEN. I have but ten minutes, and prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I want to know something about this bill.

Mr. EDEN. I am trying to tell something about it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I want to know the facts about it, not the law.

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman will read the report, which is printed in this morning's RECORD, he will find there all the facts I can give him.

It has been said in the discussion upon this bill that we propose by it to pay a class of claims that the Government is under no responsibility to pay. I take issue with the gentlemen who have taken that position. I state, and the laws of Congress will bear me out in the statement, that during the war and ever since the close of the war it has been the policy of the Government of the United States to pay every loyal citizen for supplies furnished to the Army and Navy of the United States, or supplies taken and used by the Army and Navy of the United States.

The Government of the United States never has taken the position that loyal claimants who had furnished supplies were not entitled to pay, but, on the other hand, by numerous acts of legislation, to which I would refer if I had time, the Government has recognized the right of every loyal claimant, North and South, who furnished supplies to the Army and Navy of the United States. The act of July 4, 1864, which took away from the Court of Claims jurisdiction of all claims arising during the war, expressly conferred upon the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General jurisdiction to consider the claims of loyal citizens in States not in rebellion for supplies furnished, and upon report made by the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General, approved by the accounting officers of the Treasury, every citizen not living in an insurrectionary State had a right to go before these tribunals, and until June, 1874, upon the report of the accounting officers of the Treasury and the favorable action of these accounting officers, this class of claims was paid without any further legislation.

Now, there is no statute of limitation to-day and there never has been any statute of limitations. Persons living in a State that had not been in rebellion can go there with their claims for supplies furnished during the war, and upon proper proof their claims are reported to Congress for its approval, and Congress approves and pays those claims at each session. But it is said that loyal men in the insurrectionary States have no right to be paid for supplies furnished to the Army during the war.

Such has not been the action of the Government of the United States, but, on the other hand, on the 3d of March, 1871, the Congress of the United States passed an act recognizing the right of every loyal man in the insurrectionary States who had furnished supplies for the Army or Navy or whose property had been taken or used by the Army or Navy to have his claim considered and paid.

Mr. POTTER. The right as given has expired.

Mr. EDEN. The right has not expired, but the remedy has. The right exists. We paid nearly half a million of dollars of these claims last year and we will pay three or four hundred thousand this year. But here come these minors provided for in this bill who had no opportunity to go before the commissioners of claims and assert their rights to compensation, and my distinguished friend from New York pleads the statute of limitations against these minors which is something which I undertake to say you cannot do in any other court in America except this court sitting for the purpose of deciding claims.

Mr. POTTER. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not do any such thing.

Mr. EDEN. If I misunderstood the gentleman I wish to be corrected, but I have very little time to be corrected in. Now, my friend from New York is entirely willing to have a tribunal established for the purpose of examining and considering the claims and ascertaining whether they are good and valid claims, but when it comes to the payment of the claims he backs out, if I understood the speech he made yesterday.

Now, this bill gives to these minors no more right than every other loyal citizen in the Southern States had under the law of 1871. The Court of Claims are to consider and pass upon their loyalty and upon the justice of their claims under this bill in precisely the same way in which the commissioners of claims have proceeded in all such claims in the South.

There need be no apprehension upon the part of the House that the Committee on War Claims are going to open the door to men in the South who willfully neglected to go before this commission within the two years that the statute gave the people of the eleven States to file all their claims, all of them to be filed here in the city of Washington. It was a pretty harsh statute of limitations. Well, this is not a case where a party who had a claim for supplies furnished failed to make that claim within the time prescribed by law. It is the case of parties coming here with a petition who have not had an opportunity of making such application; and when they show that their failure was the result of no laches on their part, I am in favor of letting them go before the Court of Claims and have their claims adjudicated.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why there appears to be such objection to the application of the statute of limitations to claims against the Government. It is true that this statute which limited the time for the collection of these southern claims (known as the act establishing the southern claims commission) was in one sense of the term a statute of limitation. Statutes of limitations, however, strictly speaking are enacted to cut off legal rights. But in these cases there never was any legal right. This must be conceded by all who understand the law applicable to southern war claims. Therefore the lapse of time does not cut off the legal right of anybody. There never was any legal right to terminate. The policy of the republican party was that if these claims were to be considered, they must be presented before so much time should elapse that they could not be paid without opening the door to fraud, and thus creating a tenfold greater evil than the one they were trying to remedy.

When the act of 1871 was passed, establishing the southern claims commission, it contained a section which provided absolutely that in no case should ever any of these claims be paid unless presented to this commission. I call attention to section 4 of that statute. It is as follows:

That said commissioners shall make report of their proceedings, and of each claim considered by them, at the commencement of each session of Congress, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration; and all claims within this act and not presented to said board shall be barred, and shall not be entertained by any department of the Government without further authority of Congress.

Further than that, afterward the southern claims commission was continued for four years, and the act contained this section:

That the commissioners of claims shall not receive any petition for the allowance of any claim or claims unless such petition shall be presented to and filed with them on or before the 3d day of March, 1873; and all claims not so presented shall be deemed to be barred forever thereafter.

This section was intended to be an absolute bar to any further presentation of southern claims after March 3, 1873. The object of the establishment of the southern claims commission was to sift these claims so as to provide for the payment of such as were proper before so much time should elapse that their justice could not be determined. But does it follow that, because it was the policy of the republican party, at the close of the war, when the facts could be ascertained, when witnesses were alive and could be examined, to pay claims that were not stale, it is wise or safe for Congress to open the door again for claims that have been barred, to provide for readjusting stale claims? Yet that is the proposition now advocated.

If we are to follow the policy that was adopted by the republicans after the close of the war—which was to establish a commission and to provide that no claim should ever be considered by any Department of the Government unless presented to this commission and presented within a certain time, and if not presented within a certain time they should be forever barred—we must keep the door shut by adhering to the limitations that were contained in the law establishing the southern claims commission, placed there by the republican party. Is it not going back upon that policy and turning our backs upon the precedent set by our side of the House to reopen this question now and to undertake to adjust these stale claims years after the parties have died, witnesses scattered, and evidence destroyed?

One thing further, which I think must address itself with force to the other side of the House. At the last session of Congress we had some striking experience in regard to the adjustment of stale claims which illustrated the wisdom and policy of a statute of limitation, to cut off their consideration. I refer to what was known as the southern mail contracts.

Nearly $400,000 had been appropriated for the payment of what was known as southern mail contract claims by the democratic party in the Forty-fourth Congress, to pay for carrying the mail in the seceded States from the dates between which the States seceded and the date of the proclamation of the president of the confederacy that the confederate government would assume payment. On investigation it was found that of sixteen claims filed by parties to obtain that money fourteen had already been paid by the confederate government, and their receipts were found in the archives of the southern confederacy by the very able and industrious member from Michigan, [Mr. WILLITS.]

We found that notwithstanding these claims had been presented to the confederate government and paid, notwithstanding two written reports had been made by the confederate postmaster-general recommending that the confederate government pay the claims, notwithstanding appropriation after appropriation had been made by the confederate congress to pay them, all had forgotten it. There were eleven States here represented by as honorable gentlemen as ever sat in a legislative assembly, men against whose honor no word of suspicion could be proved or exists; yet all those gentlemen had forgotten all those facts.

Now, does not that illustrate the wisdom and necessity of providing limitations within which claims against the Government should be presented or be barred? If the Government attempts to adjust stale claims, the memories of men are so defective, evidence is so liable to be destroyed or forgotten, that the Treasury will be plundered by fraud. It has always been the settled policy of wise legislators to enact statutes of limitation to apply even against legal claims, if not presented within certain limits, usually six years; this, I think, is the usual limit on contracts not in writing in nearly all the States.

How much more strongly does that doctrine apply to claims against the General Government, where the parties have died, where witnesses have been scattered, and where the evidence in the case cannot be obtained. When these claims were insisted upon by men in the South who claimed to be loyal, we said we would establish the southern claims commission. When we did so we wisely provided that it should be limited to a certain time; and when we subsequently extended it we then provided that all claims which were not presented to the commission by March 3, 1873, should be forever thereafter barred.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Then you think it right for the Government to plead the statute of limitation against loyal men?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Certainly I do; the Government should plead it just as much as an individual. I illustrated that by what we witnessed here at the last session of Congress in regard to the southern mail contracts; the result of that proved the correctness of the doctrine. No elementary authority on law can be found anywhere that will not say that the statute of limitations should apply as strongly in regard to claims against the Government as in regard to claims against individuals. In the case of individuals contending with each other they are there face to face and each can meet the evidence presented by the other. But in the case of the Government the evidence is entirely ex parte, and the Government is more liable to be imposed upon than is an individual.

But aside from that we are not proposing to apply the statute of limitation. We made an honest effort to adjust these claims while the facts were fresh; we undertook to do justice to these claimants; but it does not follow that it is within our power to do justice now after claims have become stale. This was the position taken by the leader of the democratic party in the last presidential contest. His letter which I sent to the Clerk's desk to be read at the last session is, I will say to the honor of the gentleman who wrote it, one of the most statesman-like documents ever penned upon the subject of southern claims.

Something was said yesterday in regard to the bill introduced at the last session by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] Because he opposed the pending bill the argument ad hominem—always a fallacy—was made that he was in favor of paying all claims of this character at the last session. Why, sir, the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York at the last session contained this provision:

That any person who may have a claim against the United States of which the Court of Claims would not have jurisdiction, but founded on equity and justice, and not barred by any statute of limitation provided by any law of the United States.

Now, I would like to ask any gentleman how such a claim as this, or any claim belonging to the class of which this is a representative, could be allowed or paid under the bill of the honorable gentleman from New York? That bill was, I think, a wise measure, and it provided in express terms that no claim should be considered or allowed that was barred by any statute of limitations of the United States, and it provided further that no claim should be considered unless presented within six years after it originated; and in any event, under that bill, the court could only certify the facts, after they were judicially ascertained, to Congress, to be paid or not to be paid as Congress might see proper.

Mr. Speaker, this whole subject is in a nutshell. Shall the policy inaugurated by the republican party, which meant to adjust these claims while the facts were fresh, and meant to bar them after a certain date, be adhered to? In other words, shall this door which was shut by the legislative action of the Government be opened? That is the whole question. If we open it for one, we must open it for all. If we adhere to the policy already established, and decide that the door which has been shut shall remain shut, that ends the matter. So far as I am concerned I am in favor of keeping that door shut. I say now, as I have always said, that this is not simply a party question. We find men on both sides of this House honestly believing that this door ought to be opened; we find men on both sides honestly believing that this door ought to be shut. Those men who believe that the door should be kept shut ought not to vote for such a measure as this, because if passed it will be like the little droppings of water under a dam, which, if not promptly observed and arrested, will finally undermine and break through and become a sweeping and devastating flood.

The ingenious devices resorted to for the purpose of getting this whole subject again opened are perfectly astounding. Nothing but a determination upon the part of Congress to set its face like flint against the opening of this door can prevent mischief that will be beyond calculation.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Does the gentleman think it would stir up mischief for the Government to pay an honest debt?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Well, sir, that is begging the question. I say it will stir up mischief for the Government to open this door so that claims may be presented to this House and pushed through without our knowing whether these claims are honest or dishonest, and when by reason of the lapse of time the justice of which it is absolutely beyond the power of the Government to ascertain.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARTIN. I propose now to yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia has but a minute or two remaining, but the Chair is perfectly willing to recognize the gentleman from New York in his own right.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well; I will take the floor in my own right.

The gentleman who just sat down said that this question was in a nutshell. So it is; and I wonder that it required so many trip-hammers to open it. I believe that all laws are revocable. The Constitution itself is revocable in the prescribed mode. Congress under the Constitution has no right to establish a statute of limitations which cannot by law be repealed. Who on the other side or on this side proposes to make here a law which shall not be revocable? And when the question is as to repealing any law, whether in the nature of a statute of limitations or otherwise, in order to get at an honest equitable claim, my vote is due to the claimant. When it is proposed, as in this case, to refer a claim to a court to decide it—to decide it, perhaps, better than we of this body can do—I am in favor of such a reference of an honest claim. I will not prejudge the claim so far as to say that it is honest, but I will send it to a proper tribunal for examination.

This is not a new question in this House; it is an old question. I remember that when I was chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims claims came in here hampered by statutes of limitations—statutes which were proper perhaps in one regard, for it was the intent of those statutes to exclude stale claims and to close the coffers of the Treasury against their payment. But in cases like this, where the claim is fresh, in cases of minors or widows, or where people are beyond the seas, and therefore could not present their claims, I would not throw impediments in the way of honest adjudication and prompt payment. I care not for the letter of Governor Tilden or any other person on this subject. It is my right and my duty here to pass on all just claims. No doubt his letter was wise in many regards, but it is no direction to me in my duty. I will not plead the statute of limitations, sir, to prevent justice or to condone fraud or wrong. There is no rest, we are told, for the wicked, and there should be no rest in pursuit of righteousness. The more we pursue wrong either in politics or in courts of justice, the more we pursue right in our legislation irrespective of these limitations by statute, the better it will be for the country and the more honestly we will act in our relations to Congress.

Mr. BRAGG obtained the floor.

Mr. MARTIN. I cannot yield any further.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not wish to dispute with the Chair, but I have only yielded ten minutes and then two minutes, and I should like to know how my time has expired.

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman had more than half an hour yesterday. The Chair recognized the gentleman from West Virginia as having control of the bill. There seems to be some misunderstanding. This bill may run for weeks in the morning hour—may occupy many morning hours. The committee is only restricted to two hours in making reports. The bill is in the control of the House.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I was inquired of yesterday, when I stated my opposition to this bill, whether I had any fears it would be not fairly dealt with in the courts; whether I did not feel assured in a judicial body this bill and claims akin to this would receive a fairer discussion and disposition than in a legislative body. I answer by saying to the gentleman that I have no fears of some judges upon some questions, neither have I any fears of some courts upon some questions; but when there are questions which are not purely judicial but quasi-political, a judge, however pure he may be, and he may be as unbiased as one of the distinguished members of the electoral commission, yet his decision may be such as the honest judgment of mankind cannot approve. Judges are but men. When they are translated from legislative halls or from the forum to the bench they act with precisely the feelings that actuated them when they were legislators. They are men still. They are subject to the same bias and the same prejudice and the same political predilections, and sometimes, unconsciously to themselves, to the feeling of the community which is brought to bear upon them in the shape of public opinion.

This bill seems to be regarded as a proposition which is to give a remedy to certain parties for rights which they have, but which have been cut off by a statute of limitations, that it is in furtherance of some natural or legal right which existed in the party. I say to the gentlemen who make such claim that no right exists in any party who lives in an insurrectionary territory, who is part of the people in insurrection against the Government or who are at war against the Government, to make claim against the conqueror after the war shall have ended for any injury which may have been done while the war was going on.

The argument goes as well against loyal people as disloyal. The war was not against individuals. The war was against the belligerent party, the South, and the difficulty is, although there may be men, there may be women, there may be children who have claims which we feel ought to be paid, yet when we open the door for the payment of such claims it is impossible for the Republic to determine between the good and the bad, and while we are attempting to do what will be a solitary case of good we throw open the door to evil which bids fair, if we take bills introduced into this House as earnest of what is to come, to hasten the hour when bankruptcy shall come upon the Government by reason of the payment of claimants under the guise of loyalty.

This is the proper outcome, perhaps, of the southern claims commission. That commission I always regarded as an evil. That commission I always regarded as a political expedient for the purpose of building up a party in the South in accord with the Administration. Instead of being a judicial court, it was a political court. Instead of being a court where justice was done, it was a court that spread fraud and perjury all over the land.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. I understand the gentleman to state these parties never had any legal claim on the Government. Under the second section of the act of March 3, 1871, loyal claimants of the South were authorized to go before the commissioners of claims and prove their claims, and upon proof the commissioners were to report them to Congress, and Congress was to pay them. I ask the gentleman whether they did not under the limitations of that law have the right to go to that commission and recover the value of this property?

Mr. BRAGG. I was just reaching that point. I will give my views on that subject, which will be an answer to the gentleman from Illinois. I said the southern claims commission was an evil. Without it no claim existed on the part of any one. With it a right to a claim was extended upon certain conditions. It was not a claim, a right against the Government, which existed independently of that particular law. Therefore when persons failed to take advantage of the privileges of the law and to bring themselves within the law—which was wrong, I assert, in itself—they cannot now make a claim. They are barred of any legal, natural right. It was a conditional right extended them. They failed to avail themselves of it; and the question now is, among those who thought that commission was an evil and that the reopening of it will be a renewal of the evil, whether it shall be opened with an isolated case which will furnish a precedent for opening it for every other isolated case that may be presented.

But we are told, (and it is a plausible argument,) that we ought to pay for supplies that were furnished to our Army, to our starving soldiery. Is there anything in this report to show that these supplies were actually furnished to the Army?

Mr. EDEN. Unless that is proved, these parties cannot recover a cent under this bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I say that when the committee report a bill to this House and make an argument that this claim for supplies furnished the Army should go to the Court of Claims, that committee ought to have proof before it that those supplies were furnished, by whom they were furnished, for what they were furnished, to whom they were furnished, when they were furnished, and the reason why the parties did not receive a quartermaster's certificate.

Mr. EDEN. We had that identical proof, but as it was ex parte we thought it would be better to refer the case to the court, where the other side could be heard.

Mr. BRAGG. I have heard a great deal of ex parte testimony. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know that the Court of Claims takes all its testimony by depositions; that A, B, and C, as commissioners, may take depositions in some part of Louisiana from Tom, Dick, and Harry, with no opportunity for rebuttal unless the United States Attorney-General's Department shall make itself a traveling attorney-general's office to hunt up facts as to the character of the witnesses?

Mr. EDEN. That court tries cases from all parts of the United States.

Mr. BRAGG. And it is a most remarkable result that in nineteen cases out of twenty the judgment goes against the Federal Government because there is no sufficient test as to what is the loyalty to be proved by depositions before the court.

Loyalty is a sentiment. There are gentlemen upon this side of the House who served in the confederate army who can furnish more proofs probably that they were loyal to this Government than we could who fought upon the Federal side, because they can prove by witnesses that what they fought for and what they sought to maintain was a government upon the principles of our fathers and that we northern men had seen fit to attempt to tear down the structure that our fathers left us, and they were loyal and we were disloyal. [Laughter.]

Loyalty is a sentiment; and when you undertake to prove by depositions that this man was loyal or that that man was loyal you can bring up one of his field-hands to swear that he heard old massa say when he did not get proper pay for stores that the confederates had taken from him, or when his son was refused furlough, that he would like to see that southern government go down and that such tyrants as old Bragg, who shot down soldiers for visiting their homes when passing on the march, should not be upheld as representatives of the government. You can prove by that negro how he heard massa say that day he was opposed to the confederates. Now that is ex parte testimony. The affidavits do not cover the whole ground, and it is not in our power to sift such evidence.

Only the other day I heard a gentleman, a member of this House from North Carolina, say he knew of a woman from North Carolina who had proved a large claim in the court of commissioners of southern claims and had established her loyalty; while, if they had called upon him, he could have proved to the court conclusively that she and all her family and friends were heart and soul friends of the confederacy.

Mr. WADDELL. You may say that of 95 per cent. of the population of the South.

Mr. BRAGG. I say it of 99 per cent. And the only recommendation that woman had for her loyalty, and which carried her claim through the court, was that her brother-in-law was a member of the convention which nominated a recent President of the United States. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from North Carolina says that 95 per cent. of the population of the South were true to the confederacy. That recalls to my mind the very eloquent remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.] I was astonished that a claim so exceedingly loyal as this should find the gentleman from Mississippi as its champion. When did the Vicksburgh district before send a man here who represented the loyal people of that district, who should stand here and sing praises and chant pæans in honor of the loyal Southerners. [Laughter.] Ay, when I heard that speech, and saw in my mind's eye the long array of loyal claimants, and thought of their antecedents, I felt like saying to them what the mouse said when it saw the old cat hanging up against the wall: "Oh, you are there, my old friend, are you? You may stay there, for I would not trust you though your skin was stuffed with straw." [Laughter.]

Mr. CHALMERS. I would like to say to the gentleman that my colleague [Mr. HOOKER] is now out. He kept quiet the other day when my colleague was present. I do not think he should assail him behind his back.

Mr. BRAGG. It is not my purpose to assail any man; but if the gentleman says that I say behind his back what I would not say to his face, he mistakes the man whom he calls to order.

I beg pardon of the House if I have improperly alluded to the speech which the gentleman from Mississippi made yesterday in support of this claim; but I have got tired of seeing claims come here in one form, which, when this House expresses its sense upon them, are suddenly diverted into another channel, and of hearing persons talk about judicial examining and making laws fixing the rules of evidence to tie up the court, and then send the matter to accounting officers to determine what the value of the property taken was.

I would like to remind the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] how he quoted in his famous speech against the William and Mary College the well-settled law that no nation is responsible for the torts of its officers or soldiers, for the destruction of property in the course of war in insurrectionary territory; but, as I said, there has been in this House repeatedly a taunt thrown at us, and I regret to say that it comes from Mississippi.

We have been taunted with the $34,000,000 in the Treasury that belong to some one unknown or to the Government as proceeds of abandoned property and ought to be distributed in the South.

I would ask these gentlemen to take their eyes off from the $34,000,000 for a moment if they want to appreciate how we feel. Let them turn the glass over and look at another view—a sea of blood—thousands and tens of thousands of the best men in the land, North and South, weltering in their gore. Let them hear the cries of the wounded man from the battle-field as the cold chill of death strikes him, and by the cessation of the groans you knew that one more soul had gone to his final account.

Let them go and hear the piteous moans from the hospitals; let them go to the hill-sides and mountain-tops, and to the valleys where thousands and hundreds of thousands are in mourning.

Then let them look at what is of the least account in the reckoning, the thousands of millions, the billions of money that were spent to put down this war; and when they place all these on the debtor side of the account, I would like to have them strike the balance—show, if they can, that the $34,000,000 of credit which belongs to somebody, they do not know whom, overcome the entries on the debit side.

I am not willing to sit here as the Representative of my constituents and allow these measures to be brought up in one form or another; from one member and another; from one committee and another, for the purpose of getting money out of the Treasury on the plea of loyalty.

These loyal men of the South are so few that the evil that will be done by leaving them out is nothing in comparison with the great evil that will be done if we open the door and allow the $17,000,000 for claims upon our Calendar to be passed and appropriations made for the benefit of men on the plea that they were loyal people of the South.

I have here time and again heard a threat thrown to the democracy upon this side of the House which I have thought for a long time needed an answer, and it came from Mississippi. I have heard it said here upon the floor of the House that unless the democracy of the North is more liberal, that unless they would open their hands and give out money more lavishly from the Treasury, the solid South would soon go over to the other side.

I say, as one of the Representatives of the democracy of the North, that if there are any men in the South who propose to belong to the democratic party simply for the reason that the doors of the Treasury are to be opened to them, the sooner they go over the better for them, the better for our party; and when the people of this country see and feel, as they are beginning to do, that they can trust the interests of the country with the democratic party of the North and South, then we can make recruits in the Northern States that will fill up our ranks to the maximum.

We have no need of that class of gentlemen that we can only hold to party allegiance by golden ties, by giving them the promise of everything which they may ask out of the Treasury.

Mr. MARTIN. I must now insist upon the previous question.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for five minutes. [Cries of "Yield!" "Yield!"]

Mr. MARTIN. I will yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. ELLIS. Upon the general features of this bill I do not know that I desire to say anything now. What I am about to say is called forth by that portion of the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in which he alluded to certain "taunts" made by southern members in reference to money now in the Treasury collected illegally and unconstitutionally; ay, and he might have well said with the robber's hand. In the course of my speech upon the Mississippi levee bill I did allude to the fact that $86,000,000 were in the Treasury of the United States collected without the semblance of law or justice from the impoverished South.

Now, I agree with the member from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that the percentage of "loyalty" in the Southern States during the war was a great deal less than 1 per cent. I undertake to say that the southern man who was born there, who was reared there, and who was identified with the southern people, could only have been loyal when he entered the confederate army and did his full duty as a soldier in the armies of the South. Such men were the only loyal men in the South. They were loyal to their country; they were loyal to their God; they were loyal to the noblest and highest and holiest emotions that ever animated the human heart.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I do not yield.

The SPEAKER, (rapping with his gavel.) The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair need not rap me down while I am asking the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants the gentleman to rap himself down. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The Chair seems——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is bound to protect the gentleman holding the floor if he declines to yield.

Mr. CONGER. I addressed the Chair, and I addressed the gentleman speaking, and he nodded assent to me.

Mr. ELLIS. I positively decline to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I know the gentleman does now, with the assistance of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will be kind enough to take his seat.

Mr. ELLIS. Here and there, scattered over the South, there may have been some individual who from his heart and from his conviction did espouse the cause of the Union, but I do not know in all the limits of my acquaintance in my own State more than three or four men who I believe were loyal to the Union in the proper sense and usual acceptation of that term. Before hostilities began there were in the South thousands and tens of thousands of men who deprecated and deplored the gathering strife and who sought by every means to avert war and disunion, but when war came more than 99 per cent. of the men of the South, every man almost worthy the name of man, forgot individual opinion and entered the ranks and fought the battles and suffered the calamities and death of the confederacy. As regards the claims which are forever being urged by "loyal" claimants and known as war claims, let me say that I for one am willing here and now to vote for a constitutional amendment which shall close the books and forever settle the accounts between those loyal men and the Government. I do not stickle for their allowance or urge their payment. Some few of them are just, no doubt, and ought to be paid. I know, personally, of a few cases of this character; but in order to achieve peace, in order to silence the tongue of slander, in order to ease the hearts and minds of the people of the North who are jealous lest some rebel be paid, I am willing to end all this matter by a constitutional amendment forbidding forever the payment of every claim growing out of the war. In this, at least, am I agreed with the member from Wisconsin.

Now as to the lecture which in questionable taste he has seen fit to read to members of this House, southern democrats, I tell him that it comes with rather a bad grace from him. When I alluded to the fact that there was in the Treasury of the United States $86,000,000 illegally and unconstitutionally wrung from the products of the South—products singled out for illegal and unconstitutional taxation, so decided by a decree of our highest court—when I alluded to moneys wrung from Southern States and property by means and processes which no man dares now vindicate, I did but allude to these facts by way of appeal for justice from the North to the South. We of the South were claiming a mere pittance, in all some $5,000,000, for the improvement of the Mississippi River, in which the gentleman from Wisconsin and the people he represents are interested. I cited the fact, hoping perchance that hearts like the members from Wisconsin might be a little softened toward a measure we deemed so just.

Mr. BRAGG rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ELLIS. Now, sir, no democrat to my knowledge in the South has proposed to desert the democratic party, or the democrats of the North——

Mr. BRAGG. I simply desire to say——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ELLIS. No southern democrat has intimated a desire to desert the democratic party. [Cries of "Louder!" "Louder!"]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We want to hear what the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will not be interrupted.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope I will be allowed to proceed and to speak in my own way and manner.

The people of the South believe that they are as democratic and as true to the democratic party as the gentleman from Wisconsin and his constituents. We went to war, it is true; but let the truth be told. It was in obedience to what we conceived to be the teachings of democracy that we accepted the call to war. From Jefferson and Calhoun we had learned that the States were sovereign. Believing this, a majority of our people believed that under the Constitution the States had a right to secede. We exercised the right; war was the result. At last, then, the war was one for the construction and application of the Constitution. We were defeated, and our theory, which we sought to vindicate by arms, was swept away. We now recognize as the result of war a great and radical change in the spirit of our Government. Especially is this so with regard to the question of internal improvements. Originally southern democracy held that the States being sovereign and the powers of the General Government limited and specified, the power of the Government to aid in works of internal improvement was narrow and limited.

The doctrine that opposed works of internal improvement by the General Government rested upon the doctrine of State sovereignty; in other words, of the right of secession. We of the South sought to vindicate that theory by arms. Democrats of the North like the gentleman from Wisconsin took up arms to destroy it. They succeeded. And now having destroyed by the bayonet the basis, the foundation upon which rested the old democratic doctrine of non-internal improvement by the General Government, they contend that the superstructure still exists, and constantly and bitterly oppose Government aid to internal improvements which the crying needs and wants of the impoverished South demand. To our demand for aid they respond, "The Constitution does not allow Congress to aid you;" and we who warred and were overthrown in our attempt to vindicate and maintain that view of the Constitution are told by the men whose swords and bayonets defeated us that the construction of the Constitution which we fought for, and which they overthrew, still prevails. What nonsense!

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MARTIN. I now insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Southern members have been reflected upon, and I appeal to the House to give us a little more time.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MILLS obtained the floor.

Mr. EDEN. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. EDEN. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. MILLS. Can the gentleman take me from the floor?

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the Chair must announce the close of the morning hour.

Mr. MILLS. I ask for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to occupy the floor for five minutes.

Mr. MILLS. If I can have the floor to-morrow, I do not press the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to the floor in the next morning hour.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. As debate is now cut off after allusions have been made to me during my absence, which I wish and intend to reply to, allow me to inquire whether this question will be the first thing in regular order to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour, if called for, will be the first business in order immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HOOKER. And this bill will be the unfinished business, I understand?

Mr. CONGER. Has not this committee now had its two days?

The SPEAKER. It has had its two days to make reports, but this bill, not being yet disposed of, must remain in the morning hour until finally acted on. Under the rules of the House a single bill may thus run in the morning hour for weeks.

Mr. CHALMERS. I rise to a question of privilege. I understand that the remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] were intended directly for me, and not for the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELLIS.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is not a question of privilege. The gentleman in the due course of the business of the House will no doubt obtain the floor.

Mr. CHALMERS. Very well, sir; I am ready whenever the time comes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 613) subjecting the Fort Wayne military reservation in the State of Arkansas to entry as other public lands in said State;

An act (S. No. 1374) authorizing the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution to appoint an acting secretary in certain cases; and

An act (S. No. 1297) for the protection of dairymen, and to prevent deception in sales of butter and cheese in the District of Columbia.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEE BILL.

The SPEAKER. This evening was set apart by consent of the House, amounting practically to a suspension of the rules, for the consideration of what is known as the Mississippi levee bill; but the memorial services of Mr. DOUGLAS, late a Representative from Virginia, are about to take place, according to the notice given by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE;] and as these will be followed by the customary adjournment of the House, the session of to-night will necessarily be dispensed with. The Chair therefore asks that next Tuesday evening be assigned for the consideration of the Mississippi levee bill. If there be no objection, this bill will be in order next Tuesday evening, at half-past seven o'clock, with all the rights that would appertain to its consideration this evening.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DEATH OF HON. B. B. DOUGLAS.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Speaker, on the 8th of the present month my colleague [Mr. HUNTON] announced that he would to-day submit for the action of the House appropriate resolutions of respect to the memory of our late colleague, Hon. B. B. DOUGLAS. Mr. HUNTON is unavoidably absent to-day, and by his request I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret of the death of Hon. BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS, a Representative from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That the House do now suspend the consideration of all other business in order to pay appropriate respect to the memory of the lamented deceased.

Resolved, That in token of regret the members of this House do wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House do communicate these resolutions to the Senate of the United States.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Speaker, after the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress on Friday, the 20th of December, and while the members were busily engaged in making preparations to return to their families and their homes to enjoy the Christmas holiday, the friends of Hon. BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS, of Virginia, were startled by the announcement that he was lying at the National Hotel, in this city, in a very critical condition. Hastening to his bedside, his colleagues found him completely prostrated, and it was painfully apparent that his days upon earth were numbered and that he could not long survive. His family and friends were immediately summoned from Virginia by telegraph and arrived in this city on Saturday evening. If the faithful ministrations of a skillful physician, or the constant attention of sympathizing friends, or the tender nursing of a fond and affectionate daughter could have availed to stay the hand of the destroyer, our deceased friend would have still lived; but, alas, at such a time how vain is the help of man! He lingered through the night, and at an early hour on Sunday morning, the 22d of December, while the city was still wrapped in repose, his spirit left its earthly tabernacle and ascended to the God who gave it. His mortal remains were placed in charge of a congressional committee and conveyed to the family burial-place in the county of King William, in Virginia, where, on Monday afternoon, in the presence of his sorrowing and grief-stricken family and friends, they were committed to their final resting-place, and the solemn words, "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," were pronounced over his grave by a venerable clergyman of the Episcopal church.

BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS was, in many respects, a very remarkable man, and it is eminently proper that the Representatives of the people upon this floor should pause for a time in their customary avocations to review the history of his life, to recount his private virtues and public services, and to render a proper tribute of respect to his memory. He was born at Providence Forge, in New Kent County, Virginia, on the 21st of December, 1822. He received a liberal collegiate education at William and Mary College and the famous University of Edinburgh. He was graduated from the law school of Judge Beverly Tucker in 1843, and having been admitted to the bar in 1844 he practiced his profession for a short time in the county of New Kent and also in the city of Norfolk. Having married the daughter of Robin Pollard, a prominent citizen of King William, he located in that county in 1846 with as flattering prospects of success in life as any young man could reasonably desire. He rose rapidly to distinction in his profession, and soon occupied the front rank as an able practitioner and eloquent advocate. He was thoroughly versed in all the intricacies of the law, and enjoyed an enviable reputation as a safe, reliable counselor; but it was in the trial of causes before the jury that his great talents shone most resplendently. His power over the juries in the circuit where he practiced was truly wonderful. He was engaged in many important and exciting trials, and however eminent the counsel associated with or arrayed against him, it was always conceded that his was the speech of the occasion. Such was his acknowledged ability and so extensive was his popularity that when the convention to remodel the constitution of the State was called in 1850 he was chosen with great unanimity a member of that body from the district composed of the counties of King William, Hanover, Spottsylvania, and Caroline. His colleagues were Francis W. Scott, Corbin Braxton, Eustace Conway, and Edward Morris. After the ratification by the people of the new constitution, in the formation of which he had borne a conspicuous part, he was elected a member of the senate of Virginia in 1852, and served continuously in that body until 1865.

Among his colleagues in the General Assembly during that period were such men as A. H. H. Stuart, Robert A. Coghill, Joseph Christian, Henry W. Thomas, James Nelson, James F. Johnson, Alexander Rives, Robert Saunders, R. T. L. Beale, Frederick W. Coleman, George W. Randolph, John Robertson, Benjamin Rush Floyd, Hugh W. Sheffey, Allen T. Caperton, James L. Kemper, James Barbour, John Seddon, John B. Floyd, Muscoe R. H. Garnett, John C. Marye, and others not less prominent. Amid that galaxy of distinguished names, whose fame is not confined to the Commonwealth of Virginia but is coextensive with the limits of the American Union, it is no exaggeration to say that BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS was regarded as a "bright, particular star." He was not only esteemed as a worthy associate of those great men who have reflected so much luster upon the State which gave them birth, but he was an acknowledged leader, as is evidenced by the fact that from 1853 to 1858 he served as chairman of the committee on finance in the senate, and as chairman of the committee on military affairs from 1861 to 1865—four memorable years in the history of the Commonwealth, during which she was swept throughout all her borders by the besom of destruction and every foot of her soil was trampled by the red, fiery hoof of war.

Although a member of the General Assembly and therefore exempt from military service in the field, Mr. DOUGLAS was not content to serve his State only in her legislative halls during that trying ordeal through which she was called to pass. He loved his native State and all her traditions. He had been reared in the State-rights school which taught him to believe that his paramount allegiance as a citizen was due to her. When, therefore, her soil was invaded by hostile armies and Virginia called upon her sons to come to her defense, BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS responded to her call with a heart as unfaltering and a courage as lofty and unflinching as ever animated the breast of his illustrious progenitor in the Highlands of Scotland, whose crest was the lion's head, and whose family motto was "Do or die." He entered the army as first lieutenant of "Lee's rangers," a company commanded by W. H. F. Lee. He became the captain of his company, and was afterward promoted to be major of the Fifth Virginia Cavalry, in which capacity he served until the close of the war. He was an ardent, enthusiastic, and consistent democrat, and for the last thirty years has rendered valuable and conspicuous service in all the political conflicts which have occurred in Virginia. He was chosen by a State convention of his party a presidential elector on the ticket of Breckinridge and Lane in 1860; a delegate to the democratic national convention which assembled in New York and nominated Seymour and Blair in 1868, and canvasser for the State at large in the celebrated campaign which resulted in the election of Gilbert C. Walker as governor of Virginia in 1869.

No man of his day excelled Mr. DOUGLAS in the discussion of political questions before the people. As a popular debater he was pre-eminently distinguished for his extensive, accurate information, his logical, compact argument, his keen, pungent wit, his scathing, withering invective, and his burning, impassioned oratory. Whenever it was announced that DOUGLAS was to speak the people would come together in great crowds to hear him, and the many brilliant triumphs which he achieved on the hustings will long be remembered with pride and pleasure by his political friends and admirers. In November, 1874, Mr. DOUGLAS was elected from the first congressional district of Virginia a member of the Forty-fourth Congress, and again in November, 1876, he was elected a member of the Forty-fifth Congress. He did not take an active part in the proceedings of the House, and very rarely participated in its debates. Hence it may not be inappropriate to remark that the members of this body who have only known him here can form no proper conception of the forensic powers and intellectual vigor which have rendered his name a household word in Virginia. The most valuable service which he rendered here was as chairman of the select committee of nine in the Forty-fourth Congress to investigate the affairs of the Freedman's Savings-Bank, to ascertain all matters relating to its management, the causes of its failure, and the names of the parties responsible therefor. He undertook this work with a determined purpose and prosecuted it with commendable industry. His report, submitted on the 19th of May, 1876, is a valuable contribution to the history of the times, showing clearly the origin and structure of the Freedman's Bank, how grossly it was mismanaged, how its funds were misapplied by the officers and agents, and how the poor freedman was deceived and betrayed by those to whom he confided the investment of his small, hard-earned savings.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, given a very imperfect sketch of the life and public services of my departed colleague and friend. No man of his generation in Virginia had a more vigorous intellect, a more courageous temper, or a more generous disposition. That he had his faults and frailties it would be uncandid to deny. These were known to the public generally; but his intimate friends and associates only knew how to appreciate properly those rare magnetic qualities of the heart which drew around him and attached to him so warmly all who came within the circle of his personal acquaintance. I know that I utter a sentiment which will touch a responsive chord in the breasts of those who knew him best when I say that as a citizen no man was more patriotic and public spirited; as a friend no man was ever more unselfish and true; as a husband and father no man was ever more tender and devoted. That mother Commonwealth which he loved so well and upon whose bosom his mortal remains now calmly repose will long mourn him as one of the noblest and brightest of her sons, and among her people the name of BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS will long be held in grateful and affectionate remembrance. It is not for me, Mr. Speaker, to teach the moral lesson to be drawn from this sad and afflictive bereavement. In the presence of such a solemn event I feel that silence would be more eloquent than words.

Since the organization of the Forty-fifth Congress seven members of the House of Representatives have been stricken down by the hand of death. As these notes of warning are ever and anon falling upon our ears it would be well for us all to pause in the midst of these busy and exciting scenes to reflect upon the shortness and uncertainty of human life, and to remember "what shadows we are and what shadows we pursue."

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Speaker:

I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him.

Shakspeare in his day recognized the fact that in delivering the funeral orations of men their unrestricted praise was common. From his day to ours this practice has not changed. It is indeed a pleasant task to recount the kind acts and good qualities of our departed friends, but duty to the living and justice to the dead require that a man's eulogist truthfully narrates his prominent characteristics; for no man in this life is all good—none perfect—and the biographer who only writes of his hero's merits is set down a failure and his works unread.

I come to bury Mr. DOUGLAS. "He was my friend, faithful and just to me." A friend was he indeed in all that the word means, although we never met till the Forty-fifth Congress assembled in October, 1877; but then, being on the same committee and hence often together, strong ties of friendship rapidly formed. He was warm-hearted, generous, hospitable, brilliant as a conversationalist, eloquent, ardent in his friendships, and eager to resent any affront offered his friends. He was an earnest advocate for what he believed to be right, and his errors were always toward the weak and erring. On our committee work, where so many cases came from poor broken-down patentees for an extension of their patents, he was always in sympathy with those who had been pecuniarily unfortunate in their inventions, and was always ready to bend the rigid rules of the committee to assist them out of their misfortunes, and on more than one occasion did he eloquently and vehemently urge his fellow-committeemen to but that once give the poor applicant the benefit of another term of his patent.

What nobler quality can a man possess—a mind constantly on the alert to alleviate the miseries of the unfortunate? Such qualities of the heart bring hosts of friends and admirers. Mr. DOUGLAS was loved and admired by all who knew him well.

He was a liberal-minded man, as are all men of education and travel.

It is he who thinks all Christendom is bounded by his horizon, that the whole boundless universe is inclosed within his immediate neighborhood, who is your narrow-minded fellow who knows he is right and who cannot be convinced that he, his family, or party ever did or ever could do wrong. He it is who always strictly follows the bidding of his party leaders and never concedes any good by the opposition.

Such was not Mr. DOUGLAS. He was a stanch democrat, but felt always that there were many good men in the republican party and that that party had done much good.

I remember the last conversation I had with him. It was in walking from his hotel to the Capitol but a few days before he died. In that conversation he referred to Virginia and the progress made in those localities where immigration had come since the war, and said the old State needed new blood; in fact that whole conversation showed the breadth of his views and the liberality of his mind. The world needs more men of his ideas and we should cultivate them.

Thinking men have come to the conclusion that a country has more to fear from the ignorance of its own people than the assaults of its outward foes; and to-day, if our Government has special ground to fear, it is because our citizens do not familiarize themselves with the people, their manners and customs, the habits, thoughts, and wishes of portions of our country remote from where they reside.

A man who, like Mr. DOUGLAS was, is a leader in his neighborhood and who shapes its tone and feeling is of more service in this direction than scores of those who follow. Mr. DOUGLAS had one other quality for which he was noted—truthfulness—and whatever faults a man may have if he possess the jewel truth they sink into insignificance. If we can implicitly rely upon every word a man utters we instinctively admire him, and in this regard at least we bid our boys to pattern after him; but let a man be untruthful, and the world shrinks from him; and though he have the brain of a Web-ever, the logic of a Calhoun, or the eloquence of a Clay, he is nothing; his life is a waste, and strive he never so hard, he cannot rise.

Truth is in each flower,
As well as in the solemnest things of God.
Truth is the voice of nature and of time;
Truth is the startling monitor within us.
Naught is without it; it comes from the stars,
The golden sun, and every breeze that blows.
Truth! It is God, and God is everywhere.

Still, Mr. DOUGLAS had faults, and what man possessing such strong social qualities has not? Yet no man who knew him would for once think of him other than as a brilliant, noble, kind, generous man, thoroughly well-bred and hospitable, with a large, warm heart, always on the alert to do some good to poor, suffering humanity. Requiescat in pace.

Mr. HOOKER addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, again are we called upon to mourn the death of an honored member of this House. It should admonish us all that "in the midst of life we are in death."

The exemplifications of this solemn truth have been fearfully frequent in this body during the past few weeks. Four of its members have gone down to the tomb, and the tomb never received within its somber walls four nobler or braver spirits. Each possessed all those high and commanding attributes of both head and heart which combine to form that noblest work of God, an honest man.

Him whose memory and merits we to-day commemorate by these public and appropriate proceedings I first met in Virginia in the gubernatorial campaign of 1869. The acquaintance then begun in the midst of the heat and excitement of that memorable struggle soon ripened into a warm and devoted friendship, which continued to the day of his death unabated and unmarred by a single estrangement. In that contest he acted a conspicuous part. Clearly comprehending the perils which environed his native State, he abandoned a lucrative business and the comforts of home, and, entering the political arena, by his sturdy eloquence and unanswerable logic contributed much to the achievements of that grand triumph which restored civil government to his beloved State and placed her once more in harmony with the Federal Union. But his patriotic services to the Commonwealth were not confined to this one great struggle. Years before and in his early manhood, by the force and vigor of his intellect and his unswerving integrity of character and purpose, he rose rapidly in public confidence and esteem, until he came to be regarded as one of the foremost men of the State and among the ablest debaters who ever graced the halls of the Virginia General Assembly.

Brave and chivalrous in spirit, honest and independent in thought and action, as prompt to resent an insult as to forgive an injury, earnest in his convictions and sincere in his friendships, BEVERLY DOUGLAS commanded alike the confidence of his friends and the respect of his foes. Doubtless he had his faults, but who has them not? From the day when Adam was driven forth from the garden of Eden to the present moment the pages of recorded history, either sacred or profane, are illuminated with the name of but One of spotless humanity. And what a fitting rebuke that One—the despised Nazarine—administered to the Pharisees, (a sect not yet extinct,) who would stone a woman because she had sinned, when he said unto them:

He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.

There are faults of the head and there are faults of the heart. The former may sometimes be excused, while the latter may always be atoned. My late colleague possessed few faults of the head and none of the heart. His great heart ever beat responsive to all that was manly, generous, true, and sincere.

But, sir, I did not rise to pronounce a panegyric upon my deceased friend, but rather, in the briefest manner possible, to attest my own appreciation of his noble qualities and rare worth. A careful survey of these would suggest many useful lessons, but none more pointed and expressive, perhaps, than that—

He lives most who feels most, acts the noblest, lives the best.

Mr. SPRINGER. My acquaintance with BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS began with the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress. Of his life previous to that time I know but little, and will leave to his colleagues from Virginia, who have known him from his youth up, the task of speaking appropriately of his earlier years.

An examination of the RECORD of the Forty-fourth Congress, the first of which Mr. DOUGLAS was a member, will reveal the fact that he began his congressional career with a zeal and industry and sustained himself in debate with an ability that gave assurance of a brilliant future. His constituents were not slow to recognize in him a faithful and able representative.

He was the chairman of a special committee for the investigation of the affairs of the Freedman's Bank, and conducted the matter with untiring industry and remarkable success.

He was an earnest advocate of retrenchment of public expenditures and of reform in the civil service of the country. On one occasion, in March, 1876, he moved an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, reducing the salaries of members. In the course of the debate he said:

In that section of the country which I in part represent, standing in the presence of a diminishing revenue and the paralyzed industries all over the country, with a constant decline in the expense of living, the people did demand, in a voice that must be heard here and elsewhere, that there should be a retrenchment in the expenditures of this Government. My equanimity will not be at all disturbed by any taunts about my sincerity. I will let that question be tested by my acts. I will respond to the demand of my constituents and of the people of this country for retrenchment in this Government, in every branch of it, the legislative as well as the others.

Those who knew Mr. DOUGLAS never for a moment doubted his sincerity. He was not a demagogue; he tried to deceive no one; he was always truthful and sincere. In advocating the reduction of his own salary he evinced his unselfish devotion to the interests of his constituents. He never thought of self, of his own interests or ambition, but moved forward fearlessly in the advocacy of what he believed to be the right. He had a delicate sense of honor; he did not impugn the motives of others, and he resented with indignation the slightest reflection upon himself or his friends. He was broad and liberal in his views, and adhered with unmoved purpose to his principles. He was generous to a fault, kind to friends, loving to his wife during her life-time, and devoted to his children to the hour of his death.

Mr. Speaker, I will not speak of his frailties. De mortuis nil nisi bonum; yet he wronged no man but himself. Who of us will be able to claim as much in the last day?

In the death of BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS Virginia has lost a faithful Representative, those who knew him a firm friend, and his children a kind and loving father. Living, he "loved his fellow-men," and dead, his memory is cherished by them. May he rest in peace—

Let the lifeless body rest!
He is gone who was its guest.
Gone as travelers haste to leave
An inn, nor tarry until eve.

Traveler! In what realms afar,
In what planet, in what star,
In what vast aerial space,
Shines the light upon thy face?

In what gardens of delight
Rest thy weary feet to-night?"

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, we are in session at this hour that we may appropriately honor the memory of a fellow-member of this House. At your request, sir, on the 22d day of last month, with other members, I accompanied the remains of Hon. BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS from this city to their final resting-place, in his native State. Mr. DOUGLAS was born in New Kent County, Virginia, December 21, 1822. King William County, where we saw him buried, was his home, and in it he passed the greater part of his life. Thither he went shortly after he had completed his academic, collegiate and professional training, and a few months subsequent to his admission to the bar in 1844, when he was twenty-two years of age.

He was carefully prepared for his chosen profession. The courses of study to which he was subjected for discipline in the institutions of learning, in Virginia and in the University of Edinburgh, in Scotland, had not failed in their offices. They had thoroughly fitted him for an honorable and useful life. The marked enthusiasm and ability, of which he furnished early and abundant evidence, very soon gave him a foremost place among the best lawyers in King William and the adjoining counties. Many honorable incidents and triumphs in his early and later career as a lawyer, in the scene of their occurrence, are there remembered and fondly cherished. They had their birth in a mind well cultured, in great personal integrity and honor, and in a heart full to overflowing of true kindness. They could not fail, as they did not, to make for him many and steadfast friends. They furnished a reason for the unmistakable regard and esteem in which he was held by his neighbors and friends. They overtopped faults and found expression in tears as his remains reached these friends and his home.

At the age of twenty-eight, Mr. DOUGLAS was a member of the constitutional convention of Virginia. At that early period in his life, he was classed among the number concerning whom the Commonwealth entertained large expectations. Immediately succeeding this public service in the constitutional convention, he commenced one of twelve years' duration in the Senate of the State. He here held an honorable rank among his colleagues. He was a ready and forcible debater.

I refer more especially to the life of Mr. DOUGLAS between the years of 1844 and 1861, because in this time he founded and built up a reputation so honorable to himself and to which his many friends now unite in pointing with just pride. It was during this period that he won for himself, by faithful labor in professional and public life, the strong attachments which remained to him, even to the grave. He had the personal characteristics which made him popular with the people. He was eminently generous. He will long live in the memory of many a humble person in King William County for some act of kindness which will have no record, save in the faithful memory of those upon whom he bestowed his beneficent acts.

As the funeral procession was moving from the church to the grave, a colored man, of middle age, approached me and said: "Will not the coffin be opened? Mr. DOUGLAS was my friend; I want to see him once more." For what reason this poor citizen thus felt and spoke I cannot tell. He knew the reasons. Beyond doubt he had received some aid, some encouragement, some generous treatment from his lost friend.

Human history, Mr. Speaker, is always at fault because never complete. So the published life of an individual will be at fault, for it will leave out many an act of private beneficence, many a noble deed, many a great effort for the good of others. These acts may have no record save in the books kept by God himself.

Though the life of our friend may teach the truth that—

> 'Tis wondrous difficult, when once beset,
> To struggle through the straits, and break th
> Involving net;

yet it has been my pleasure to find in that life the fruits and achievements of a liberal mental culture, and especially the deeds wrought from the impulses of true kindness, for I remember that > Kind hearts are more than coronets.

Mr. PRIDEMORE. Mr. Speaker, solemn and imposing ceremonies cannot stay the hand of death, nor alleviate the distresses of the living. Yet the common consent of mankind justifies the erection of monuments to the memory and the recording of the deeds of the illustrious dead. Deeply impressed with the sad rite accorded our distinguished and lately departed brothers, I was moved to see as the mournful panorama passed before me men whom the world calls great—grave and reverend Senators, foemen in the ambitious contests for political supremacy—moving down these aisles, arm in arm, like children. There, too, was the President of the United States, and distinguished judges who sit to pass in the last resort upon the most sacred rights of man; all bowed to the triumphs of the conquering hand of death, before whose victories their wisdom was turned into folly, their ambition into humiliation, and their fame into forgetfulness. A moment and they pass on, each to resume his journey in life—a journey that in its turn must end in death. Amid the solemnity of these scenes my eyes fell upon the vacant seat of my distinguished colleague, the late Hon. BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS. Memory recalled the men and the times when, more than a quarter of a century ago, he came first upon the theater of public life. At no period had Virginia presented to the world a greater array of her gifted sons or distinguished men. Major DOUGLAS at an early age contended with these his countrymen for the prize of political and forensic supremacy, and won for himself a name second to no man of the times.

Devoted to the history and traditions of his native land, he worshiped at the shrine of her past glory and rising greatness. While yet in the prime of life and advancing fortune war sounded her dread trump, and called to arms. Differing with many of his countrymen, but sharing the views of his own people he joined them in the conflict, and asserted amid the sulphuric flames of battle what he and they believed to be the constitutional rights and sacred honor of Virginia. He bore without spot or blemish the colors committed to his hands, and won from strife and death distinguished honors as a soldier. He had seen and served the old State in the pomp and power of her prosperity. He now followed her fortunes in the dangers and perils of adversity; beheld her devastated fields, desolated homes, and fatherless children; ay, more, he saw the triumphs of war blot her from the galaxy of States, and himself and comrades disrobed of the sacred rights of citizenship; saw strangers giving laws and claiming dominion over the land of the Berkleys, Henrys, and Randolphs. To this common fate he bowed in silence and awaited—it may be impatiently—the hour of her redemption. The shackles at last cleft from his hands, his comrades and countrymen again crowned him with honors and clothed him with the powers of a Representative upon this floor.

But of his services here others can more fittingly speak. With a mind more than ordinarily gifted by nature, strengthened by a classical education, humorous and genial, he lent a charm to social life that made him the idol of the society in which he moved. Through his long and varied services as a citizen, soldier, and public man no blot or stain ever approached the sacred precincts of his fair name. May the sod rest lightly upon his bosom and Virginia ever hold his distinguished services in grateful remembrance; for of all the great and good now resting in her soil there sleeps not one who loved her more than DOUGLAS.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I rise with some hesitation to speak of our deceased fellow-member, Hon. B. B. DOUGLAS, as I have not had that personal acquaintance which would admit of my speaking of him from a stand-point of acquaintanceship. Although I saw and knew Mr. DOUGLAS frequently upon the floor of this House, I was never brought in contact with him. I knew not of his sickness until I heard of his death.

Death has inexorably added many to his list from this House. Nothing has been so gratifying to the friends of each as the sincere regret for the loss and sympathy for the mourning relatives—as the impressive ceremonies observed by the House.

The entire absence of personal knowledge of Mr. DOUGLAS on my part will compel me to be very brief. Others will have spoken of his life and personal qualities at greater length. I can only speak of him as a member of this House, except as I have learned of him from others who have known and admired him in earlier years and to the time of his death; and I honor that great heart in human nature which, while it forgets the faults of the dead, remembers the virtues and all good qualities.

I am able to speak of our deceased member with more particularity because of the fact that I was one of the committee appointed by the Speaker of this House to escort the remains to their "last house." I did not feel at liberty to neglect that duty, notwithstanding many other duties.

The immediate friends of Mr. DOUGLAS spoke of him in the highest terms. At his old home his funeral received every evidence of the confidence, not to say devotion, of the community to his name. The love for him and admiration for his memory were manifest everywhere in his district. He was brilliant as a senator of the State and as a lawyer at the bar—called the Nestor of the bar—and his ability was recognized and acknowledged until death claimed him.

In the chilling excursion across the country to the home of Mr. DOUGLAS the committee appointed by the Speaker received every evidence of esteem and honor. No pains were spared to have us understand that we had come as the committee attending the remains of Mr. DOUGLAS and therefore as friends of his people. No higher evidence of the devotion to the deceased or reverence for his services and memory could have been shown than were during the visit of the committee.

At the time expected by the friends we met them at the village of Mr. DOUGLAS's residence and attended his remains to the church. The entire community seemed to be present to attest their respect for his memory. Impressively Mr. DOUGLAS was buried, near his deceased wife, and near his old home, and there "may his ashes rest in peace."

I am told, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. DOUGLAS was brilliant and able, and regarded by his constituents as one of the most promising and really able men of Virginia.

Mr. Speaker, if Mr. DOUGLAS had faults or frailties (and who is free of all our human kind) we cast the mantle of Christian charity over them, after the example of the Great Master. The immediate friends of the deceased member testify also to his goodness of heart and openness of hand. I commend his excellencies and "leave his short-comings to his Saviour."

Not much can be said to remove or alleviate the article of death. There are those who feel this affliction more than we, those who feel that "the silver cord is loosed, and the golden bowl broken." And now when the night and shadow of death have settled upon our brother, and the veil has been dropped between him and us, and when the "mortal has put on immortality," we commend to the guardian care of the all-wise Father the orphan little ones of the household. And, too, nothing which may be said by human tongue can lift the burden which the death of a father rests upon the hearts at the hearthstone. We can only recognize these visitations with that awe which knows no power of resistance.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the advent of a new member to this Hall is sometimes under circumstances which place him in a relation to public business not congenial to his tastes nor suited to the exhibition of his peculiar powers. It is thus not possible for his associates to appreciate his merits or to estimate the grade of his capacity. Especially is this the case with one from the South, the relations of which to this Government for many years have made southern men much less familiar with the general policy of the administration of public affairs than are gentlemen from the North.

The members of this House from one cause or another have had no adequate opportunity to understand why the people of his district selected my late friend and colleague, Hon. BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS, as eminently worthy to represent them in this House. It is therefore the duty, not only customary but imperative, of his friends to present in its proper light the character of Mr. DOUGLAS and to delineate in truthful lines the noble qualities of his heart and the splendid endowments of his intellect as he was known to us; because he never found the appropriate occasion for manifesting them in the discussions upon this floor.

I knew him in boyhood, for we were schoolmates at the Richmond Academy, an institution well fitted to prepare a student for his collegiate career. Its teachers in the classics and in mathematics were eminent in talents and character and possessed of large acquirements.

I remember him at that early period as distinguished for his talents as a debater—talents which shone so splendidly in his after life. He was educated liberally at William and Mary College and at Harvard. He studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, and afterward the law in the school of William and Mary. He gave rich promise as a collegiate of future eminence.

He was a planter as well as a lawyer, and thus his professional life was developed according to a type so peculiar in Virginia and other parts of the South—that of the country lawyer.

This is a character which is now fast passing away, whom I would fain rescue from oblivion. Such a lawyer lived upon his farm, which he cultivated, and attended the courts, without any strict devotion to business in his office. His library was not measured by the number but the weight of his books. He read and mastered Bracton, Coke, Hale, and Blackstone. His reports were few—my Lord Coke's, Salkeld, Saunders, Atkyns's, Equity Cases, and the like. He read history much, and studied the human heart profoundly. Amid the mountains, hills, valleys, forests, and fields about his country home, he meditated much upon natural law. The principles of right and justice implanted in the instincts of our nature and deducible from observation and experience, he evolved from his own native intuitions and reason. He wrought out by original thought what law ought to be, without learning much from the decisions of the judges, and thus in ninety-nine cases in a hundred he found what was the law in any special controversy. He was less technical than the city lawyer, skilled by ample practice and full libraries in the infinitely varied phases of social contacts and contracts. He was less scientific, but more philosophic; his views were less astute probably, but more broad and fundamental; and his generalizations less accurate, because deduced from a less number of particulars.

The law he learned was that whose "seat is the bosom of God and whose voice is the harmony of the world:" Nec enim alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac, sed et omnes gentes, et omni tempore, una lex et sempiterna et immutabile continebit.

It was by this self-discipline, by this evolution of law as a system of real right, of absolute justice, in the political, social, and domestic relations of men, from the profound study of human nature and of the records of human history, that Patrick Henry was enabled, the country lawyer of Hanover, to write upon the fly-leaf of his Coke upon Littleton those resolutions of 1764, proposed in the Virginia house of burgesses, which challenged George III to remember Cæsar's fate and the bloody scaffold of Charles Stuart; to strike the key-note of religious emancipation when he pleaded for the people against the parsons, and to forge the thunderbolt of revolution in the proclamation of his sublime dilemma of "Liberty or Death," to the colonies struggling in the military grasp of British despotism.

I do not doubt that John Marshall, the most illustrious of the Chief-Justices of the United States, under the classic shades of his country-seat at Oak Hill, framed the inexorable logic of his argument in the case of Jonathan Robbins, and constructed those canons of interpretation in that series of marvelous judgments, which laid the foundation of his fame as the greatest expounder of our Federal Constitution.

Time fails me to tell of the judges who were trained in this school of natural law for the science of jurisprudence. Pendleton and Wythe, Jefferson and Madison, John Taylor and Roane, and a host of others, are a galaxy of great men who were thoughtful jurists, though not case lawyers, taught by a profound knowledge of human nature and a large and varied experience in human affairs, to rear the temple of a sound jurisprudence, upon the deep foundations of natural justice and upon the law of God.

In my own life I have known scores of such men whose broad and comprehensive views of right and wrong, and whose acute and powerful minds thus trained, made them the equals and frequently the superiors of other lawyers, learned in cases and trained by the reading of law books and reports without end.

Mr. DOUGLAS was such a lawyer. Far less well read in reports than many of his cotemporaries, but with an acute and powerful mind, analytic in its processes and clear and intuitive in the detection of a fallacy; logical and cogent in reasoning, full of satire, sarcasm, and humor; overwhelming in invective, with literary taste and culture to add grace and ornament to his argument, he was the peer of any of his associates at the bar, and the superior of most of them in his genius as an advocate before the courts and the most intelligent juries of his country.

But there was another arena upon which he attained an excellence even higher than at the bar.

The hustings of Virginia from an early period has been the scene as well as the school for the highest powers of debate.

The county courts of Virginia, meeting every month, have been the occasions for the assembling of the people. On court-day the representatives of opposing political parties met upon the hustings to discuss public affairs. The people heard both sides, quietly and fairly.

The debaters divided time—opened, answered, replied, and rejoined. In the olden time the country people listened in dignified silence. The clap-trap of the demagogue was but little heeded. With sound sense and true eloquence, principles were expounded and facts were arrayed which carried the day. All the resources of reason, oratory, wit, humor, invective, and satire were called into play; misrepresentation was corrected by the adversary, detraction was subjected to censure, and fallacy in reasoning to exposure.

This institution of our society was a discipline to the gladiators and a school of instruction to the people. It begat fairness, candor, and sound reasoning in the debaters, and furnished the people with the materials of a just decision upon the great questions of the day. I may be excused for saying that one of the most memorable debates which authentic tradition has given us occurred upon the hustings at March court, 1799, of Charlotte County. The greatest orator of America made his last, and his successor to the confidence of his people made his first speech; and thus as the sun of Henry sank below the horizon in its evening splendor, that of his youthful friend rose into the firmament in its morning glory.

On the hustings Mr. DOUGLAS had no superior, and few if any equals. He met foemen worthy of his steel, and I have in my possession a letter from one of the present judges of the court of appeals of Virginia, so long a distinguished party rival and yet warm personal friend of Mr. DOUGLAS, in which he says with generous praise:

> I knew him and felt him in the full flush of his intellectual powers and transcendent genius. I have met him at the bar, in the senate and on the hustings, and I can truly say, after no small experience, that he was the equal, if not the superior in these different arenas of any man I ever heard speak.

Mr. DOUGLAS was for many years a member of the senate of Virginia. As a debater in that body he was, if not the first, in the very first line. A distinguished statesman of Virginia, and a political opponent then, has often said that he regarded him as able a man as his great namesake of Illinois, (with whom the narrator had served in Congress,) and a better speaker.

If I may venture to criticise Mr. DOUGLAS's intellect I would say that his powers were rather analytic than synthetic, more able to detect and expose error in an adversary than to build up a theory of his own, more destructive than constructive in its powers. He labored for the truth, which he loved, but he worked with more vigor to destroy falsehood, which he detested in the depths of his soul.

Having thus spoken of the mental power of my friend, it remains to speak of his character. That he had infirmities and faults I do not deny. Let him who has no beam in his own, seek to pluck the mote out of his brother's eye! Let charity and the grave hide them from our view; while his virtues bloom in fragrant memory about his tomb.

He was brave and generous—"A Douglas tender and true." "The Douglas in his hall" was hospitable, kind, and liberal to rich and poor. His nature was benevolent and charitable. Quick to resent a wrong, he was placable and easy to forgive if none was intended; and, when assured he had wronged another, his magnanimity in redressing it was prompt, noble, and conspicuous. Ardent and constant in his affections, he was tenderly devoted as a husband and father; a loyal, liberal, and unselfish friend that did not follow wealth and fame, nor leave the wretch to weep.

As a private citizen and neighbor he was just, kind, and public-spirited. His integrity and honor were beyond question. As a public man he was incorruptible, honest, sincere in his opinions, and broad and catholic in his views.

Can we wonder that his people loved such a man, and trusted him as their Representative, and clung to him with fond admiration of his genius and of the noble qualities of his nature? And will not the Representatives of this great Union join with us of Virginia in mourning the loss of so much of genius, ability, public honor, and private virtue to his family and friends, to his State and to our common country?

Death has of late been busy in laying his icy hand upon our comrades in this Hall. Among them all, I scruple not to say that the grave has closed upon no one whose genius and noble characteristics merit more richly our sympathy and our honorable sorrow than my life-long friend and colleague, BEVERLY DOUGLAS. While we pay our tribute to his mental endowments and moral worth, let us reach out with the warmest sympathy of our hearts to his bereaved and orphan children, whose only solace will be found in human love and in the tender mercies of the God of the fatherless.

The question being taken on the resolutions submitted by Mr. GOODE, they were adopted unanimously: and then, in accordance with the last resolution, (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers and a report of Major Godfrey Weitzel, Corps of Engineers, relative to the transfer by the State of Michigan to the United States of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act of June 18, 1878, a report from Major W. P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers, on the survey of New River, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the river and harbor act of June 18, 1878, reports from Captain W. H. H. Benyard, Corps of Engineers, on examinations of the Big Sunflower, Coldwater, and Tallahatchie Rivers, Mississippi, the Upper Red River, Louisiana and Texas, and of the Little River and Fourche la Féve River, Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented the petition of Mrs. Mary H. Thistle, widow of the late Captain Hezekiah L. Thistle, a soldier in the war of 1812, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Harriet Ross, widow of Thomas R. Ross, praying for a pension on account of services rendered by her late husband during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a joint memorial passed by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, at the tenth regular session, 1878, in which they represent that the Umatilla Indian reservation is one of the most valuable and fertile portions of the State of Oregon; that it contains about five hundred thousand acres, and is now occupied by only about four hundred Indians; that if it were thrown open to settlement by the whites, it could sustain a population a hundredfold greater than it now does; that the Indians residing on it have lately been acting in a hostile manner toward the whites, and that they are deteriorating by contact with the large white population by which they are now surrounded. Twenty years nearly have expired, during which, by the terms of the treaty made with them, they are to draw annuities from the Government, and the memorialists affirm that the best interests of humanity and civilization demand that the Indians should now be removed to some more secluded portion of the country; wherefore they most respectfully pray that measures may be taken to extinguish the title to the lands which the Indians now occupy, and to remove them to a suitable place in some Indian Territory. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of the mayor and common council of the city of Seattle, Washington Territory, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a steamer for the revenue marine service for service in the Alaska waters, and for the passage of a law providing a civil government for the Territory of Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Robert C. Corbaley and others, citizens of Oregon, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the entrance to Coos Bay and harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of Peter Eldridge, a soldier and pensioner of the war of 1812, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of Mrs. Jane Dulany, widow of the late Colonel William Dulany, of the United States Marine Corps, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WATER SUPPLY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. DORSEY. I present a communication from Colonel Casey, of the Engineer Corps, in relation to the Washington Aqueduct, which I shall be glad to have read and printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant informing me that the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia have instructed you to call my attention to the following resolution, adopted by the Senate on the 17th instant, and to request me to submit to them my views on the subject contained therein:

"Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to report to the Senate what action by Congress, if any, is necessary to secure to the residents of Capitol Hill and other elevated portions of the city of Washington a proper supply of water, what appropriation of money, if any, is required, and to transmit to the Senate such facts relating thereto as they may deem important."

In compliance with the request of the committee I submit the following statement:

The Potomac water that is supplied to the cities of Georgetown and Washington is brought by the conduit of the Washington Aqueduct from the Potomac River, above the Great Falls, to the distributing reservoir.

This conduit is circular in section, nine feet in diameter, and has an uniform grade of nine and one-half inches to the mile. Its length from Great Falls to the distributing reservoir is twelve miles, and it can discharge into the reservoir about eighty million gallons in twenty-four hours.

The distributing reservoir, situated two miles west of Washington, is a basin of forty-four acres, and its flow line is one hundred and forty-five feet above tide-water at the Navy-Yard, an elevation sufficient to supply by gravity any point in Washington.

From the distributing reservoir the Potomac is brought to Georgetown and Washington by three iron mains of twelve, thirty, and thirty-six inches in diameter respectively.

The twelve and thirty inch mains were furnished and laid by the United States. The thirty-six inch main was furnished and laid by the District of Columbia.

The mains distribute about twenty-five million gallons every twenty-four hours. The population of Georgetown and Washington is about one hundred and forty-six thousand, and if the supply of water were equally distributed, the daily consumption per head would be one hundred and seventy-one gallons; which is more in proportion to the population than that of any other city in the United States. But the supply is not equally distributed, and with the present system of mains and pipes, it cannot be.

When the Potomac water was first introduced the supply was abundant, and but little attention was given to distributing it equally. In Georgetown four-inch pipes and in Washington six-inch pipes were connected here and there with the nearest mains, without reference to a well-planned system, and it has resulted in a net-work of pipe-connections delivering the water without uniform pressure.

Comparatively uniform distribution of water would have been insured if each city had been divided into districts, each district mapped in reference to altitude and provided with a main proportionate to its area.

The simplest and easiest method of increasing the pressure in the pipes upon the high grounds is to lay another main from the distributing reservoir to Capitol Hill.

This main should be connected with the present system of pipes only on Capitol Hill and other portions of Washington of equal or higher altitude. It should be three feet in diameter, and located on a route to be determined from a careful survey. It would convey to Capitol Hill, at an elevation of one hundred and twenty-five feet above tide, ten million United States gallons in twenty-four hours.

The taking of water from this main to supply the northwest portion of Washington, which is higher than Capitol Hill, would not materially diminish the pressure and, consequently, the supply on Capitol Hill.

The following is an approximate estimate of the cost of furnishing and laying a cast-iron main, three feet in diameter, from the distributing reservoir to Stanton Place, on Capitol Hill, a distance of about twenty-eight thousand feet:

12,040,000 pounds of cast-iron, at 1¾ cents	$210,700
Hauling and distributing, laying and jointing, including excavation and back-filling, lead and gaskets, stop-valves, masonry, &c	132,680
Engineering and superintendence	15,000
Advertising, rent of wharf, and miscellaneous	4,300
	362,680
Add 10 per cent. for contingencies	36,268
And the total will be	398,948

The furnishing of this additional quantity of water to Washington in the manner herein recommended would render the completion of the Potomac dam at Great Falls a necessity.

The dam is now built only across the Maryland channel of the Potomac River, and for several years past the consumption of water in Washington and Georgetown has amounted to more than the minimum flow of the Maryland channel.

During the season of drought, when the river is at its lowest stage, the supply of water to Washington cannot be materially increased until the Potomac dam is built entirely across the river to the Virginia shore.

I inclose with this a map of the Washington Aqueduct, extending from Great Falls to the Washington navy-yard.

Respectfully submitted,

THOS. LINCOLN CASEY,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers,
in charge of the Washington Aqueduct.

To Hon. S. W. DORSEY,
Chairman Senate Committee on District of Columbia.

The communication was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 578) for the relief of Edwin M. Hart, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 884) for the relief of William H. Varney, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Surgeon George F. Winslow, United States Navy, praying that the date of his commission may be changed from the 2d of April, 1875, to May 27, 1871, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SARGENT. The subject of the bill (S. No. 1622) appropriating money for payment of bounty to officers and men of Flag-Officer Farragut's fleet, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, is pending by previous reference before the Committee on Appropriations. I report the bill back, therefore, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Naval Affairs will be discharged from its further consideration and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, from the special Committee on the Tenth Census, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1685) to provide for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to give notice that I shall endeavor to call the bill up on Tuesday next after the morning hour, with a view to its passage on that day.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1263) to provide for the adjustment and settlement of certain internal-revenue taxes erroneously assessed and collected from the Cumberland Valley Railroad Company, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1292), for the relief of Elias D. Brunner, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1497) to authorize the President to appoint George Glass a master in the Navy, not in the line of promotion, reported adversely thereon, and recommended its indefinite postponement.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar. The precedent has already been established in such cases. One or two persons have been appointed under precisely similar circumstances, and it would be a hard measure to make a discrimination against this man. I hope to bring the bill before the Senate for its favorable action for these reasons.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1624) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase land adjacent to the custom-house in the city of Providence, Rhode Island, reported it without amendment.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BINDING FOR THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5655) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1878, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it favorably, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read for information. I reserve the right to object.

The bill was read.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the act to which this is an amendment provided that all binding at the Government Printing Office should be in plain sheep or cloth, except record and account books; but it excepted from the provisions of that law the Congressional Library. The object of this bill is also to except the library of the Surgeon-General's department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because there are a number of series in the library; there are about six hundred series there; and they have been bound in a peculiar way, that is, in half binding, with morocco backs and tips in red, which is the best color for resisting insects and gas. It is desirable to have the series continued in the same way. These books are for permanent use and preservation, and not for distribution.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURNSIDE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1686) for the relief of Sarah E. Rose; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1687) authorizing the appointment of E. F. Wenckebach to a second lieutenancy in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1688) for the relief of the Menomonee Indians in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1689) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Sioux City and Pembina Railroad Company through the public lands of the United States, from Beloit, in the State of Iowa, to the Missouri River, in the Territory of Dakota, at or near the mouth of White River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VOORHEES (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1690) to provide for the distribution of land patents to certain States where the local land offices have been closed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1691) giving the consent of Congress to an agreement or compact entered into between the States of Virginia and Maryland respecting the boundary between said States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1692) authorizing the President to nominate Herman Biggs to a second lieutenancy in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MATTHEWS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1693) to grant to the American Ocean Cable and Telegraph Land Wire Association, of Philadelphia, the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate submarine telegraph cables on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States and establish telegraphic communication between the United States, Europe, and Asia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1694) to guarantee to the people of the several Territories the right to elect certain territorial officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. ALLISON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SENATOR FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

On motion of Mr. WADLEIGH, it was Ordered, That 100 copies of the minority report of the subcommittee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Messrs. BUTLER and Corbin be printed for the use of the committee.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I submit a report from the conference committee on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 39 and 44.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 48, and 50, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 12, with an amendment striking out lines 8 and 9, page 2 of the bill; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 24, and agree to the same, with an amendment striking out lines 24 and 25, page 12 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 49, and agree to the same, with an amendment adding, after the word "Hong-Kong," "Ottawa;" and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM WINDOM,
W. B. ALLISON,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
O. R. SINGLETON,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the report lie upon the table for one moment until I ascertain whether the original bill is here. It is possible that the report should be presented first in the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I correctly understand the Senator from Minnesota, the Senate asked a conference on this bill. That being so, the report with the bill should go to the House of Representatives for their action, and we have no regular possession of the bill at this time in that case.

Mr. WINDOM. I have ascertained the fact that the report should be made in the other House first, and I ask leave to withdraw the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be withdrawn for the present.

Mr. WINDOM. It can be presented again after we hear from the House of Representatives.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREYS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will resume the consideration of the calendar of general orders at the point where its consideration was left off yesterday, under the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] The bill under consideration yesterday was the bill (S. No. 819) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffreys.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Rosa Vertner Jeffreys $844, the balance in full compensation for the use and occupation by the military authorities of the United States, in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, of certain property in Lexington, Kentucky, devised to her, and formerly owned by Daniel Vertner, now deceased.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The report was read yesterday, I believe.

Mr. BECK. The report was partly read yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not ask to have it read. I read it myself afterward. What I should like to ask, in order to be perfectly sure about this business, is whether the evidence was absolutely complete before the committee that this lady has the legal title to this money? The property it appears was the property of some other person while the United States used and occupied it.

Mr. BECK. Only for the first month or two. The property belonged to Daniel Vertner who was a very old man and died in 1861, leaving by his will the property for life to his wife, a very old lady also, with the reversion to Mrs. Jeffreys, their adopted child. On the 1st of January, 1863, Mrs. Vertner made a conveyance of all her life estate to Mrs. Jeffreys, and from that time on she was the absolute owner of the property. These papers were all before the committee. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] had them before him a year or two ago I remember. The reversion was in Mrs. Jeffreys from the time of Mrs. Vertner's death, and the life estate was transferred to her on the 1st of January, 1863, and she held it until May, 1865.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What period of time was covered by the occupation of the United States before this lady's title accrued?

Mr. BECK. From October, 1862, until the spring of 1865 the property was occupied by the Government, so that for the first two months of the occupation the life estate was in old Mrs. Vertner, but all rights, rents, and everything reverting to Mrs. Jeffreys after the death of old Mr. Vertner were transferred by his widow to Mrs. Jeffreys on the 1st of January, 1863.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was the widow the executrix of the will?

Mr. BECK. I think she was. I have not the will before me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course the Senator, being a good lawyer, is perfectly aware of the fact that this claim for the use and occupation of land would not descend to the heir, but would be personal assets and would have to be disposed of by the executor. If the committee are satisfied that we are perfectly secure on that point, I have nothing else to say.

Mr. BECK. I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that I examined this matter very carefully when it was before me at a former Congress. I reported a bill on the same subject over a year ago, having examined the points carefully. I do not report the bill now and cannot state the facts, but at that time I gave it special attention and am satisfied the claim is correct.

Mr. BECK. I desire to amend the bill by striking out "844" and inserting "5,000" before the word "dollars." I think that is the amount which ought to be paid; and if the Senate will allow me a moment I will state the reason why. The property of Mrs. Jeffreys was worth $20,000 at the time of the occupation. It was one of the largest and handsomest residences in Lexington, and furnished completely. The personal property was shown by the valuation of our most intelligent and respectable persons to be worth at least $9,000. The real estate alone, the personal property being all gone, either taken or destroyed by use during its occupation by the Federal officer, was sold immediately after the war for $9,000. The use and occupation of the premises by the Army for the three years that they had it, furnished as it was, not holding them responsible for damages, could not have been less than $2,500 a year. That would be a reasonable rent for the house and furniture, used as it was, for the ordinary wear and tear of the premises, real and personal. In the Forty-third Congress this matter was carefully considered, and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] made a very careful report upon the case. Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, who was then a very prominent republican member of the Committee on Claims, made the following statement to the Senate in regard to the bill for the relief of Mrs. Jeffreys then pending:

MR. SCOTT. I can state very briefly about this claim. The house occupied was one of the finest in the city of Lexington, and it was filled with a library, plate, very fine furniture, and many other appliances of luxury used by the family to which it belonged. If it were possible to allow for the whole extent of valuation that was destroyed in that property $20,000 would not pay the owner, and I regret very much that it was not in the power of the Committee on Claims to allow the full amount, and I regret just as much that the War Department has not seen proper in many instances to take the shoulder-straps from some officers who permitted such spoliations as the evidence showed were permitted in that house and on that property, where very valuable carpets, libraries, &c., in a house occupied as the headquarters of a high commanding officer, were permitted to be despoiled and carried away. The amount allowed, after very great contest in the committee, is not more than one-fourth of the damages suffered, and all such items were excluded. This amount is for rent and actual damages, and it was the result of a very protracted consideration in the committee. I think the claim is entirely just and ought to be paid.

That was on a report for the payment to this claimant of $5,000. The bill passed the Senate without any serious opposition. It also passed the House; but it passed the House within ten minutes of the time of the final adjournment. If it reached the President before the House adjourned he had not time to look at it, and therefore it did not become a law. The report on the bill now before us was made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] and agrees in all the facts stated by the Senator from Oregon in the former report. The Senator from Minnesota in his report says the testimony establishes the fact "that when the property was abandoned, about April, 1865, the house was greatly injured, wholly unfit for a residence, and its furniture, library, and other property almost entirely destroyed or gone, and that all this damage was done while in the possession of and under the control of the United States authorities." But at the end of his report he says that, as the commanding officer agreed to allow $1,000 a year for rent, therefore the committee would not go beyond that amount. I hardly think the Senate, when it is very evident that the use and occupation alone was worth at least $6,600, and only $1,600 were paid, will fail to do what a former Congress did, and what I understand a minority of the committee think ought to be done now, and what the Senator from Oregon in a very able report set forth, and Mr. Scott and Mr. Pratt, and all the other members of the Committee on Claims of the Senate, as well as the House, awarded. Therefore I hope the amendment I suggest will be adopted.

I do not seek to make myself a personal witness, but the house is within a few hundred yards of where I live, and it is known to my colleagues as well as myself to be what Mr. Scott says it is—one of the finest residences there. The premises were used not in connection with active war, not during the occupation of the city of Lexington, which I think after 1863 never was invaded by any hostile forces, as I remember, except that some raiding party was in there occasionally for a short time. Occupied as the town was, the United States was compelled to provide a furnished house for the accommodation as headquarters for the officers of the staff stationed there, and pay at least as much as $6,600 therefor, and Mrs. Jeffreys will not get, if she is allowed $5,000, more than one-fourth of what was lost by her by the occupation and use of her property as proved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see that the chairman of the committee who made this report is absent; and if it is to be proposed to upset the report, then I object to the consideration of the bill. I do not think it right to go on in his absence and upset the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

Mr. BECK. I did not observe that the Senator from Minnesota was absent, but I hope the Senator from Vermont will not insist that it shall lose its place after he comes in. He asked me to go on with it yesterday, but not in his absence. I did not observe his absence. I hope it will only go over temporarily, subject to be called up again when the Senator from Minnesota comes in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That we shall have to determine afterward, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The call of the Calendar will proceed.

ASBURY DICKINS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to submit a motion by unanimous consent of the Senate in relation to a claim that is not on the Calendar but ought to be on it. On November 15, 1877, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] submitted a report of the majority of the Committee on Claims in the case of the heirs and legatees of Asbury Dickins. There was a minority report from the committee, but for some reason the bill was not presented with the minority report. For that reason the case was not put upon the Calendar. I now ask to have it placed on the Calendar nunc pro tunc.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be placed at the foot of the Calendar; but otherwise I insist on the regular order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hardly think that would be fair. The report was presented on the 15th of November, 1877.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Accompanied by a bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. The bill did accompany the minority report, or was not noticed perhaps by the Clerk. The bill is printed with the minority report in full. It seems to me it ought to go on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that that requires a direction of the Senate. It is simply a matter of order of the Calendar. As I understand, it belongs on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends. If the bill was not reported from the committee it does not belong to the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the bill was appended to the minority report at the end of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. At the end of the minority report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was not reported as a separate measure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A minority report is no report at all.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont, who is of course very much more experienced than I am in these matters, whether if an adverse report is made in the Senate and objection is made to its consideration at the time it is made it does not go on the Calendar under this rule?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends on whether a bill is reported. No mere report goes on the Calendar; bills go on the Calendar. If a committee has a bill before it that has been referred to it, and reports adversely on that bill, the bill goes on the Calendar as a matter of course unless everybody consents to have it indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOAR. But this was a bill, as I understand.

Mr. MITCHELL. There was a bill before the committee.

Mr. HOAR. And the report was adverse on the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that be reserved until we see what bill it was, and whether it was ever introduced by anybody, or whether it was the recommendation of a minority of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has before him the minority report, and at the end of that minority report is this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the fact; but there was a bill before the committee; the judgment of a majority of the committee was against the bill, and so it was reported adversely, but the understanding of the committee was that the bill should go on the Calendar for consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Let me see the majority report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill would have no right on the Calendar without an order of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I see the report is on a petition, not on a bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it stand undisposed of for the present.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

Mr. ANTHONY. There was a bill before the committee; my recollection is that I introduced it myself and that it was referred to the committee. If it was reported back from the committee adversely, it should have gone to the Calendar except by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The report itself states that it is on a petition. At this Congress I am informed there never has been any bill introduced into this body by anybody for the relief of these parties. It was a petition and the report so states:

The Committee on Claims to whom was referred the petition of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, deceased.

Then the minority, as a part of their report, say that "a bill of the following character ought to be passed."

Mr. ANTHONY. I may be mistaken. I know I introduced the bill at a previous session of Congress at any rate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was it as I am told.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has no right on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 6126) to establish post-routes in the several States herein named; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H.R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS.

The message further announced that the House had passed resolutions in regard to the death of BEVERLY B. DOUGLAS, late a member of the House from the State of Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. A message has come from the House in regard to the death of Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask that the resolutions of the House lie on the table, subject to be called up by me hereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That course will be pursued. The call of the Calendar will be resumed.

NEW RIVER CANAL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 820) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase from the New River Canal Company, for military purposes, the free use of an inland canal and water-route between Pamlico Sound, North Carolina, and Charleston, South Carolina, paying for the same by installments, as the work is completed between certain navigable bodies of water.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask that that be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

TERRITORY OF LINCOLN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 144) for establishing the Territory of Lincoln, and to provide a temporary government therefor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that may as well go over.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope that bill will not go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is objected to, and goes over under the terms of the order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. How does it go over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the objection of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I had not heard the objection. I was in hopes the Senate would allow a vote to be taken on the bill, at least.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It requires discussion.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It has been thoroughly discussed. It was brought up on the last night of the session, and on account of the lateness of the hour it was asked by some that it be postponed until the first Monday in December. This is the first opportunity we have had to get it up at this session. We have not asked to take it up out of its order; it comes up now in regular order, and I hope the Senate will allow a few minutes to be devoted to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to oblige my honorable friend from Nebraska; but the object of this rule allowing objection and five minutes' debate is to take up those cases that may pass by unanimous consent, matters of private right and claim that everybody agrees to. Now the propriety of establishing a Territory, which means a future State, is a matter of grave public importance that ought to be considered in time. I unhappily was ill on the 19th of June when the matter was up and did not hear the discussion. That was my only reason for objecting now.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the very reason I have for asking either for action now or the fixing of a time. If the Senate would fix a time for considering it, I certainly should not insist on action this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can move any day to take it up.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is, I think, a great necessity for this bill or some other bill of this kind. There are more than twenty thousand people in the Black Hills country that have to go by the way they travel over eight hundred miles to get to their capital. They could go in about three hundred miles if they could pass through the Indian reservations; but they would have to pass by the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail reservations. The people will not do that, and consequently they travel about eight hundred miles to get to the capital of the Territory. It is settling up rapidly. The people ask for a separate territorial organization. We have agreed generally on lines for the Territory, and a very fair boundary, I think—about two hundred miles one way and three hundred and sixty the other, containing about one hundred and eight thousand square miles.

If there were any real objections to this bill being taken up now, I would not insist on it; but I think a few minutes spent on it would not be time lost to the Senate looking to the interest of our people and the whole country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Inasmuch as objection is made to taking up the Lincoln bill this morning, if I can get the consent of the Senate to take it up on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week after the morning hour, and give a short time to it, I will let it go now.

Mr. PADDOCK. I would suggest to my colleague to name Wednesday. There is already a special order for Tuesday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought not to make any more special orders; but if the Senator gives notice that he will move to take up that bill then, he will get the floor for that purpose and will get ahead quite as fast as he can by having a special order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Inasmuch as there are other bills pressing I do not wish to be captious about this matter at all, and therefore I am disposed to be liberal and let other bills come up; but I give notice now that on Wednesday next after the morning hour I will move to take this bill from the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator at that time for that purpose. The Secretary will resume the call of the Calendar.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask permission to introduce a bill for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins; and I ask that it be put on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to allowing the Dickins bill to be placed on the Calendar without a reference?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it have its first reading.

The bill (S. No. 1695) for the benefit of the legal representatives of Asbury Dickins was read the first time by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only once now. We will look into it.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. As the Calendar has been suspended for a moment, I ask leave to make a report from the committee of conference on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, which has already been read, but a little prematurely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report was read at length on a former occasion. The question is on the report.

Mr. WINDOM. I will state very briefly the result of the conference. The bill, as it passed the House, appropriated $1,045,735; the amount added by the Senate was $82,100; making a total, as it passed the Senate, of $1,127,835.

The amendments of the Senate were all agreed to in conference, with amendments striking out from the bill the following items, namely:

For charges d'affaires ad interim and diplomatic officers abroad	$20,000
For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President	20,000
Total	40,000

Making total of bill, as agreed to, $1,087,835—an increase over act of 1879 of $10,200.

The increase is made up of the following additional items, namely:

For salaries of second secretaries of legation at Great Britain, France, and Germany, at $2,000 each	$6,000
For clerk to legation at Spain	1,200
For revising and editing Consular Regulations	3,000
Total	10,200
Deduct from this amount $10,000, in sundry civil act for 1879, for expenses of foreign intercourse and all missions abroad, &c	10,000
And this bill exceeds act for 1877	200

Mr. President, the bill as agreed to by the conference is precisely the appropriation for the current year, except the little additions I have named.

The report was concurred in.

JOHN C. BIRDSELL.

The bill (S. No. 501) for the relief of John C. Birdsell was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I object to that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WHYTE. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is objected to and goes over.

NATIONAL CAPITAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 502) repealing the charter of the National Capital Insurance Company.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator who has had charge of that bill, and who is familiar with all the facts relating to it, the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] is not in his seat. I suggest that it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WARREN MITCHELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Warren Mitchell, out of any moneys in the Treasury derived from the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, of $128,692.22, being the proceeds of cotton taken from Mitchell at Savannah, Georgia, which proceeds have been paid into the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MCMILLAN on the 6th of March, 1878:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Warren Mitchell, of Louisville, Kentucky, praying to be refunded the amount of proceeds of certain cotton seized and held by the Government of the United States and paid into the Treasury, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

The memorialist, Warren Mitchell, is a resident of Louisville, Kentucky. At and prior to the commencement of the rebellion he was engaged in business in said city and was a partner in two firms doing business there, namely, Armstrong & Co. and Mitchell & Armstrong; the first-named firm consisting of Charles Q. Armstrong, Warren Mitchell, and Isaac Russell, the last-named firm being composed of Charles Q. Armstrong and Warren Mitchell. The firm of Mitchell & Armstrong dissolved on the 1st of November, 1861. The firm of Armstrong & Co. continued until Armstrong's death, in 1862. At the commencement of the rebellion there was due to these two firms from southern debtors $116,421 or about that sum. Armstrong, whose sentiments were with the South in the rebellion, went South into the confederate lines early in 1861, and died, as it is believed, at Atlanta, Georgia, in 1862.

In July, 1861, Mitchell procured from General Anderson, the commander of the department of Kentucky, a military pass permitting him to go through the United States military lines into the insurrectionary district. The purpose of his going South, as represented to General Anderson, was to collect debts due to the firms above mentioned, of which he was a member. Under the pass thus obtained he went into the insurrectionary States in July, 1861, and remained within the military lines of the confederacy until the latter part of the year 1864, when, after the capture of Savannah, he returned to his family at Louisville.

While within the confederate lines he collected debts in confederate money, and was engaged principally in trading in the currency of the country and investing his means in cotton for himself and his Louisville firms. (Vide affidavit of Charles Estes.) In October, November, and December, 1864, Mitchell purchased and had in store in Savannah 738 bales of cotton, with marks and weights given, all of which was seized by General Sherman upon the surrender of Savannah to him, and was afterward sold; the net proceeds of which, after deducting the expenses, amounted to $128,690.22, and were paid into the Treasury of the United States.

On the 3d of July, 1865, Mitchell received from the President of the United States a full pardon and amnesty for all offenses by him committed, arising from participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion. The pardon was granted upon certain conditions which were complied with by Mitchell.

Mitchell brought an action in the Court of Claims to recover the proceeds of this cotton. The court was equally divided in opinion as to his right to recover, and dismissed the case. Thereupon Mitchell removed the case by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Supreme Court, affirming the judgment of the Court of Claims, held that Mitchell was domiciled in a loyal State when he bought the cotton in question; that the laws of war applied to all intercourse between the inhabitants of the loyal and disloyal States, and that, according to the law of nations, all contracts of the inhabitants of the loyal States with the inhabitants of the insurgent States were illegal and void; the purchase of the cotton in question by Mitchell, an inhabitant of a loyal State, from the inhabitants of the disloyal States was illegal and void and consequently he acquired no title to it.

At the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, Mitchell presented his claim to Congress, and the Committee on Claims having considered the same, reported it back recommending the disallowance of the claim.

The claim was again presented at the second session of the same Congress, and a report was made recommending the payment of $128,622.62 to the claimant.

It appears from the journal of the committee that but five members of the committee were present when this action was taken, of whom one opposed the report and two others concurred in the direction to report, but without committing themselves upon the merits of the case. The report was recommitted by the Senate to the Committee on Claims March 2, 1877.

In urging the recommittal of the claim the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] a member of the Committee on Claims, said:

"It was referred to me for special examination. I made such examination and reported adversely. The report was concurred in by this committee, and concurred in by the Senate, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. Subsequently the bill was recommitted to the committee. It was again considered by the Committee on Claims, and a majority of the committee reported in favor of the bill. In examining another case referred to the Committee on Claims since that time, the committee have discovered some very important evidence bearing upon this claim. It was claimed that this claimant, Warren Mitchell, was loyal during the late civil war. In examining the case of Conner Brothers, we had occasion to look into certain testimony taken before the district court for the district of Kentucky, and it appears from that testimony that this same claimant, Warren Mitchell, was employed by the confederate government, at Nashville, prior to the occupation of Nashville by the Federal forces, for the purpose of packing meat for the confederate government. He had a contract with the confederate government by which the live hog was furnished to him, he agreeing to slaughter the hog and return the hams, sides, and shoulders to the confederate government, and retain the rest of the hog for his pay."

The report having been recommitted, no further action was taken at that session of Congress.

At the present session of Congress, Mitchell again presented his claim, accompanied by additional affidavits of himself, Thomas M. Morgan, John B. Lewis, and a letter from V. McKnight, in support of his claim. Mr. Mitchell, in his additional affidavit, referring to the above statement made in the Senate, says:

"The commissary of the confederate government had made a contract with one R. F. Wilson of the character above stated; the said Wilson had made a subcontract with E. M. Bruce & Co., and in my absence and without my knowledge or consent, Mr. Armstrong, my Louisville partner, who was at Nashville, entered into a contract with said E. M. Bruce & Co., in relation to the business aforesaid. At this time I was in Memphis, Tennessee, engaged in making collections of indebtedness, for which purpose I had gone south under a permit from General Anderson, given me for that purpose, with a full knowledge of the object of my going, as in the papers already before you more fully set forth.

"It was not until a considerable time after the contract last named had been entered into that I returned to Nashville, and I had no knowledge of it whatever until my return. Upon being informed that it had been entered into I objected to it, and protested against it, and at first refused to have anything to do with it; but Mr. Armstrong insisted that we would be compelled to carry it out, and in pursuance of it I did for about six weeks assist in its execution by purchasing hogs and superintending a slaughter-house at Clarksville, Tennessee. I give this statement as to my relation to said contract with this particularity to the end that the committee and Congress shall know the precise facts, whatever may be the consequences. My connection with that transaction never was concealed or attempted to be. It was mentioned, as will be seen, in the testimony in the Court of Claims. The assertion that I followed the confederate army south from Nashville when it went is an entire mistake, nor did I accompany it. I was not at Nashville when it left, nor was I at any time at Nashville while that army was there. I never was with it at any time during my stay in the South, except passing through it in going from place to place, and only went to such places as my business of collecting called me. I went from Nashville to Huntsville, and thence to Atlanta by rail, where I found my old partner, Armstrong, who died in April, 1862.

"In making collections I received cotton for debts; also purchased cotton as a mode of ultimately getting good money, and as the cotton thus acquired could not be taken through the Federal lines, I sold, bought, and sold again from time to time. I sold some in the interior, and repurchased in Savannah, and some I shipped to Savannah. These transactions continued until I had accumulated at Savannah the cotton that was seized and for which this claim is presented."

Mr. Thomas S. Morgan in his affidavit states:

"In the fall of 1861 I was cashier and book-keeper for E. M. Bruce, at Nashville, Tennessee. I know that Warren Mitchell did not have a contract with the so-called confederate government to pack meat—beef and pork. Mr. R. F. Wilson had the contract to pack meat for the said confederate government, and I know he (Wilson) made a subcontract with E. M. Bruce & Co. to pack some meat at Nashville and Clarksville. Mr. C. Q. Armstrong, Mitchell's copartner, while he was absent in the Southern States on a collecting tour, took an interest in the subcontract with E. M. Bruce & Co., in the firm-name of Mitchell & Armstrong, of three-twelfths, and I do not think Mitchell had been consulted or knew anything about said contract until he returned to Nashville, some time after the subcontract had been made with Armstrong for or in the name of Mitchell & Armstrong. I also know that Mr. C. Q. Armstrong died in April, 1862, at Atlanta, Georgia. I know that Mitchell was at no time, directly or indirectly, connected with the army of the confederate government nor with said government, but that Mitchell was occupied in attending to the collection of his own and his firm's claims, and in looking after and attempting to secure the cotton he had taken and had on hand."

Of the cotton seized by General Sherman's army at Savannah, Mr. Mitchell, in October, 1864, shipped to D. H. Baldwin, at Savannah, four hundred and eighty-seven bales from Griffin, Georgia, to be sold on his account and others; in this cotton Mr. A. L. Tyler, superintendent of the Macon and Western Railroad, was interested in the profits to pay him for his aiding in the transportation to Savannah. (Baldwin's affidavit, page 8 of proofs.)

From the proofs submitted it appears that Mr. Mitchell passed through the confederate lines soon after the breaking out of the war, and remained within the insurrectionary States until the war practically closed, passing from State to State collecting debts in money or cotton, buying and selling cotton, and shipping it from place to place, as his convenience required, on his own account and on joint account with others, adherents of the insurrectionary government. It appears that during this time Mitchell not only collected the entire amount of the indebtedness due to both firms of which he was a member, but secured cotton the net proceeds of which at New York amounted to $128,692.62, or $12,000 more than the entire indebtedness to both firms. To have accomplished such a result as this under such circumstances casts much doubt upon the loyalty of the claimant.

The transaction at Nashville, however, puts the matter beyond doubt. Mr. Armstrong, the partner of Mitchell, was, without doubt, a secessionist and sympathizer with the confederacy. Mitchell not only recognized but by his personal labors assisted in the execution of the subcontract to supply the confederate government with pork. He knew what the contract was, and is too intelligent not to have known his rights and duties in the premises. That the execution of this contract was an act of disloyalty there can be no doubt.

Robert Floyd, in his affidavit submitted in this case, speaking of the claimant, Mitchell, says:

"I regarded him as a true Union man and supporter of the Government until the leading public men of Kentucky published an address to the people announcing a neutral position. After that I think Mr. Mitchell held that doctrine, but was quiet and unobtrusive. I so regarded him when he left for the South."

Hon. Bland Ballard, in a letter submitted among the papers, dated May 30, 1876, addressed to Hon. John W. Stevenson, then a Senator from Kentucky, says:

"I do not know what were Mr. Mitchell's views of the rebellion. If he sympathized with it, and I have heard and believe he did, I regret it."

The decision of the Supreme Court that the purchase of the cotton in question by Mitchell, an inhabitant of a loyal State, from the inhabitants of the disloyal States, was illegal and void, and that he acquired no title to such cotton, settles the question that Mitchell has no legal claims whatever against the Government. The testimony submitted shows that claimant was not loyal to the Government, but being permitted to pass into the confederate lines by the order of a general of the United States Army, that he rendered aid and sympathy to the confederate government. There are no equitable circumstances in the case upon which the claim should be allowed.

The committee therefore recommend that the claim be disallowed and that this report be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let the views of the minority be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

At the beginning of the war, in 1861, the memorialist was, and for years had been a merchant and resident citizen of the city of Louisville and State of Kentucky, having large transactions with, and large debts due to the firms of which he was a member, from the people of the Southern States.

The said firms with which he was connected were largely indebted to the Bank of Kentucky and other banks in Louisville.

In this condition of affairs he consulted Virgil McKnight, president of the Bank of Kentucky, and other creditors, who advised him to go South and endeavor to collect or secure the debts due said firms, as the only means of enabling said firms to pay their creditors.

For this purpose the said McKnight went with petitioner to General Anderson, then in command at Louisville, introduced him to that officer, and procured for him a pass to go South, explaining to General Anderson fully at the time the object and purpose for which the petitioner proposed to go South.

Under this pass the petitioner went into the States in insurrection in the latter part of the month of July, 1861, and remained there until the latter part of the year of 1864. During this period he collected a large amount of debts due said firms, and purchased seven hundred and thirty-four bales of cotton, which were delivered to him, and then stored in the city of Savannah. The cotton was purchased in the months of November and December, 1864. When Savannah was captured by the United States Army under General Sherman, this, with a large amount of other cotton, was seized by the military authorities, turned over to the agents of the Treasury, and then sold. The net proceeds of the petitioner's cotton, after deducting all expenses of sale, shipment, &c., as appears from the books of the Treasury, amounts to the sum of $128,692.22.

That petitioner devoted his time while in the South to collecting and securing, and in efforts to collect and secure, the debts due to his said firms, with the exception of about six weeks, which were devoted to superintending a slaughter-house at Clarksville, in the State of Tennessee, under the following circumstances:

One R. T. Wilson had made a contract with the commissary-general of the Confederate States to slaughter and pack meat. Said Wilson made a subcontract with E. M. Bruce & Co., and in the absence and without the knowledge of petitioner, one Armstrong, who was one of petitioner's Louisville partners, entered into a contract with said E. M. Bruce & Co., in the name of the firm, to take an interest of three-twelfths in said subcontract.

When this contract was made by Armstrong with Bruce & Co. petitioner was at Memphis, engaged in the collection of the debts he had gone South to collect, and had no knowledge of this contract until some considerable time after, when, in the course of his business, he went to Nashville, where he met Armstrong and was by him informed of it. Petitioner "objected to and protested against it and refused to have anything to do with it," but Armstrong had made the contract in the name of the firm, and assured petitioner that they were bound and would be compelled to carry it out. Upon that assurance he did, for the six weeks aforesaid, assist in its execution.

He then proceeded to the States of Alabama and Georgia upon his original mission of collecting and securing the debts due his firms, and in the latter part of the year 1864, as before stated, he invested his collections in cotton, as the surest if not the only means of making said collections available to his creditors who resided beyond the limits of the Confederate States.

After his said cotton was seized by the officers of the Government, under the advice of Hon. James Speed, then the Attorney-General of the United States, and an old and valued friend of petitioner, he applied for, and on the 3d July, 1865, received from the President of the United States, a full pardon for all offenses committed by him by reason of any participation on his part in the insurrection.

He then instituted suit in the Court of Claims to recover the proceeds of the sales of his cotton from the Government, but that tribunal being equally divided in opinion upon the question as to whether his contract of purchase vested the title to the cotton in him because of his residence in a loyal State, and the technical enemy relation existing between him and his vendors, who were citizens of the Confederate States, his case was dismissed and he appealed to the Supreme Court.

That court found that he had purchased the cotton, that it was captured by the officers of the Government, and that the proceeds of its sale were in the Treasury, but decided that he acquired no title by his purchase, because his domicil was in Louisville, in a loyal State, while that of his vendors was in the insurrectionary States, and that a contract made under such circumstances was void. (See 21 Wallace, p. 350.)

In arriving at this conclusion, the court held that the permit given to the claimant by General Anderson conferred no rights upon him; but your committee are constrained to think, without questioning the law as laid down by the court, that no advantage ought to be retained by the Government which resulted from the void and illegal act of its own officer. Admitting to the fullest extent the unauthorized and illegal character of the pass given to the claimant by General Anderson, after a full disclosure of the object of the former's mission, is it not plain that Mr. Mitchell would not have gone to the South at all if the pass had not been given to him? The circumstances under which the application was made and the permit granted show most conclusively that the officer and claimant were both ignorant, the one of his power, the other of his duty. General Anderson represented the Government in a high military station. The claimant was a loyal citizen, anxious to save the bulk of his fortune, about to be lost, as he thought, by the civil war then commenced. The law of nations, which was applied by the court very rigorously in this case, is founded on wise and just principles. It prohibits all commercial intercourse between the citizens or subjects of countries at war with each other, because it would tend to strengthen and increase the power of the public enemy, which it is ever the object of war to destroy.

But the object of the petitioner in this case was to collect and draw from the public enemy rather than to furnish the sinews of war, or in any manner strengthen him, and to save from destruction what had been honestly earned and accumulated before hostilities began.

Why is it that the most enlightened writers on the laws of war have landed the humane usage which permits the citizens or subjects of one nation to withdraw their property from another on the eve of hostile relations? And has it not always been an object of importance, on the conclusion of peace, to save to the subjects of the belligerent power their rights of property which were suspended during the heat of battle? We know, too, that when the private property of a citizen or subject is recaptured from an enemy by the forces or cruisers of that nation to which such subject belongs, that it is restored to him. The principles which uphold this practice spring from the reciprocal duties of allegiance and protection which constitute the most important relations in the state.

It is clear, and not disputed, that petitioner purchased and took possession of the cotton. It is equally clear that by the officers of the Government it was seized, taken from his possession, sold, and the net proceeds of the sale, amounting to $128,692.22, paid into the Treasury.

The ground, and the only ground, upon which he lost his case in the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court is, that his purchase and payment failed to vest the legal title in him, because the laws of nations prohibit all commercial transactions and intercourse between belligerents. He, a citizen of a loyal State, having purchased from citizens of a disloyal State, the contracting parties, each taking character from the State of which he was a citizen, were, in legal contemplation, enemies, and, therefore, could not legally contract. For this reason his purchases failed to vest in him such legal title as he could enforce in a court.

This contract failing to vest title in the petitioner, because it was void, certainly did not vest it in the Government, because, to make the property confiscable, it must have been purchased "with intent to use or employ the same, or to suffer the same to be used or employed, in aiding, abetting, or promoting such insurrection." (See section 5308, Revised Statutes.)

So far from any such intent appearing in this case, it clearly appears that he purchased the cotton for the purpose and with intent to send it to a loyal State to pay debts due to his loyal creditors.

Neither the purchaser nor the Government having acquired title to the cotton, the title remains with the vendors, who may, under the rulings of the Supreme Court, recover the proceeds now in the Treasury, but for the statute of limitations.

If the petitioner had been a citizen of a disloyal instead of a loyal State, his contract of purchase would have been legal, valid, vested title in him, and he would have recovered in his suit, without regard to the loyalty of either the vendor or vendee, because, in that case, the technical enemy relation would not have existed.

Contracts made between citizens of the Confederate States, even though payable in confederate treasury-notes, are held valid unless they are designed to aid the insurrectionary government.

(See Confederate Note Case, 19 Wallace, 556; Hanauer vs. Woodruff, 15 Wallace, 448; Thornington vs. Smith, 8 Wallace, 1.)

To withhold from the petitioner the proceeds of the sale of this cotton, will apply to him, whose sympathies and influence the proof shows to have been from the beginning to the end of the struggle entirely with the Union cause, a harsher and more rigorous rule than can be applied to the commanding generals of the confederate armies, under the law as interpreted by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, and upon the sole ground that he was a citizen of a loyal State.

For, if the confederate general, being a citizen of one of the Confederate States, had brought this action at the same time it was brought by the petitioner, for the proceeds of this identical cotton, on precisely the same facts, he must have recovered.

In the case of Pargoud vs. United States, the court says:

"We have recently decided in the case of Armstrong vs. United States that the President's proclamation of December 25, 1868, granting pardon and amnesty unconditionally and without reservation to all who participated, directly or indirectly, in the late rebellion, relieves claimants of captured and abandoned property from proof of adhesion to the United States during the late civil war. It was unnecessary, therefore, to prove such adhesion or personal pardon for taking part in the rebellion against the United States."

(13 Wallace, 157, 158; Armstrong vs. United States, 13 Wallace, 154; United States vs. Kline, 13 Wallace, 128.)

The minority of the committee are of opinion that the Government cannot afford to avail itself of a harsh technical rule of law to appropriate to its own use the property of its citizens, which appropriation has not, and cannot have, the sanction of equity, justice, or moral right.

For it is not pretended by any one that the Government has any title to this cotton or the proceeds of its sale. Hence, if the Government holds it, it is simply because there is no power to compel its surrender to the rightful owner.

The petitioner's contract of purchase being void, leaves the title in the persons of whom he bought the cotton. They, having been fully paid for it by the petitioner, do not complain or seek to defeat his title, and in justice and good morality no one else has a right to do so.

The minority of the committee, therefore, report the accompanying bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell, and respectfully recommend its passage.

ISHAM G. HARRIS.
FRANK HEREFORD.
JOHN H. MITCHELL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time within which the Calendar of general orders is to be considered under this special order of the Senate has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of its unfinished business, being the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, pending which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moves that the further consideration of the bill be laid aside, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions introduced by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I find by the vote last night that a majority of the Senate appears to be adverse to considering my resolutions, and as it is useless to waste the time of the Senate in insisting upon the motion, I withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole: in section 2, line 4, after the word "pronounced," to insert "as well as in all suits hereafter instituted;" so as to read:

In all suits for the infringement of a patent, in which, at the date of the passage of this act, no final verdict has been rendered or no decree for an account or assessment of damages has been pronounced, as well as in all such suits hereafter instituted, the measure of the plaintiff's recovery shall be the same, both in law and in equity.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WINDOM. Are amendments in order until the committee's amendments are acted upon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They are not, strictly.

Mr. WINDOM. I will then reserve the amendments I desire to offer until the amendments of the Committee of the Whole are disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An amendment made as in Committee of the Whole can be amended.

Mr. WINDOM. It is not an amendment to an amendment that I desire to offer. It is an independent matter.

The Secretary read the next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which was, in section 2, to strike out from line 30 to line 35, inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert:

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious or malicious or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the party guilty of such vexatious or malicious conduct or of such infringement such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, at the end of line 13, section 3, to insert:

Provided, however, Where an appeal is allowed from an interlocutory decree establishing the validity of a patent or its infringement, the complainant may be permitted, in the discretion of the court, to go on and take his account, subject to payment of costs and counsel fees, if the decree is reversed, and on giving security therefor.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe that separate action on each of the amendments of the Committee of the Whole was ordered at my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was.

Mr. WINDOM. Or at least on my objection. I desire to withdraw that objection so that the amendments may be acted on as a whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the further amendments made as in Committee of the Whole? If not, will the Senate agree to them in gross?

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WINDOM. Now, Mr. President, I propose an amendment, to come in at the end of the second section. I will say, with the permission of the Senate, before it is read that it is the amendment offered the other day with material modifications. As the amendment was proposed the other day, the plaintiff could recover no costs unless his judgment for damages exceeded $50. This amendment reduces it to $20. And also the provision which required that the defendant should have actual knowledge that he was infringing the patent is stricken out; so that it is very materially modified, and I hope in this form it may meet the approval of the Senate. It will accomplish the results desired, and I think will not be objectionable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after the second section:

SEC. —. In any suit brought in any court now having jurisdiction in patent cases for an alleged infringement of any patented article, device, process, invention, or discovery, where it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same from the manufacturer thereof, or from a person or firm engaged in the open sale or practical application thereof, or that he manufactured or applied the same for and to his own use, and not for sale nor for making a product for sale, if the plaintiff shall recover a judgment for merely nominal damages, the court shall adjudge that he pay all the costs of the suit; and if the plaintiff shall not recover the sum of $20 or over, the court shall adjudge him to pay his own costs, unless it shall also appear that the defendant, at the time of such purchase, manufacture, or practical application, had knowledge or actual notice of the existence of such patent.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment by adding after the words "purchased the same" the words "in good faith." I presume there will be no objection on the part of the gentleman offering the amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. So that the purchase shall appear to be in good faith.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota accepts the modification. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota by adding:

Or unless the court shall certify that the suit was brought in good faith and upon reasonable cause, for the purpose of trying the validity of the patent or the question of infringement, and that such question was actually in issue considered by the court or jury and determined

Mr. WINDOM. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. I think it substantially invalidates the amendment proposed by myself, and I think there is no necessity for it. The patentee or his assignee has ample opportunities to test the validity of the patent as against the manufacturer or the vendor; and I think that this would substantially destroy the amendment proposed by myself. I hope it will not be agreed to; but this bill has been debated so much that I will not take any more time to discuss it at present.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I will state the object of my amendment. It is to provide a means whereby the patentee may be able to settle his rights and the validity of his patent or the question of infringement by any given machine or any other invention, without paying the costs of that proceeding himself. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, if the plaintiff in perfect good faith brought a suit for the sole purpose of determining his rights, he would be compelled to pay the costs of that suit although he was successful.

Mr. BECK. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to his amendment would virtually destroy all the beneficial effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. The object of the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, as I understand it, is to prohibit the great multiplicity of suits which are being brought all over the country against persons who are in good faith using patented articles which they have purchased in good faith, many of them of very insignificant character. If the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire be adopted it allows all the character of suits Senator WINDOM wishes to guard against to be continued, because in every case the party will of course be able to show that he was trying to maintain the validity of his patent.

The other day when the question was up and just after the vote was taken, a letter was received by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] and handed to me with authority to read it, stating that it was from one of the most intelligent men in Pennsylvania, setting forth fully the evils of which the Senator from Minnesota complains, and which I think can alone be removed by his amendment. It is this:

JANUARY, 18, 1879.

DEAR SIR: I notice that there is at present some discussion in Congress relating to the patent laws. I would like to see our laws relating to patents changed in one particular, namely, relieving the innocent purchasers of articles made in violation of a patent from suits for infringements, or, in other words, make the actual manufacturer and vendor of articles made in violation of the patent laws liable, but not the persons who use or consume such articles when they are purchasers from others, excepting machinery, &c.

The people in the oil-producing section of Pennsylvania would profit greatly by such a law. About one-half of the oil production is the result of the use of nitro-glycerine torpedoes. They are used very extensively in all the oil counties, and there has been about a dozen different patents granted by the Patent Office department for torpedoes, but Roberts, of Titusville, has succeeded in getting injunctions on all of them from time to time as infringements on his patent, but as a general thing does not enforce his injunctions, but lets the different patentees go on, under color of law, and sell and explode torpedoes, and after the producers have settled or paid for these torpedoes Roberts then sues every man in the United States courts who has used torpedoes other than his, and compels them to pay over again to him, and thus he gets the money without any service or the use of any material. The records at Pittsburgh show really thousands of suits of this kind—a species of blackmail.

Roberts's patent is only on the fluid in the bottom of the oil-well. This may seem ridiculous, but it is true that his patent has been superseded on every point but the explosion of the shell under the natural incoming fluid. Now, the amendment that I suggest would protect the producer and leave the litigation among the patentees themselves.

The producers of our State have been robbed out of thousands of dollars by this duplicate patent business. I might say safely that not one has escaped, and a law to protect them would be hailed with joy. There are a thousand contemptible things about patent robbery as applied here.

Hon. W. A. WALLACE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

That letter presents forcibly the objection I have to the present bill unless it is amended by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota; and I have no doubt that the patentee spoken of and others of that sort go into combination with other patentees, and rather than contest with them and determine who has the true valid right they allow the other patentees, spurious patentees, if you please, to go on and sell to private parties all over the country; and those fellows, when they get their pay, furnish the original patentee with a list of all they have sold to, and he sues them again and makes them pay double, with costs and expenses of suit if they refuse. There is no effort on the part of the original patentee to sue the other patentees as infringers, but he goes into partnership with them and thus avoids all costs of litigation between them, and robs the people by combinations, and requires them to pay penalties, or sues them and drags them into the courts all over the country. It is no uncommon thing for men claiming to have patents to go over whole districts, get all the money they can out of the people, and the moment they disappear with the money in their pockets another man comes claiming to be the real patentee, and, showing an injunction against the other fellows from some court, requires them all to pay over again; and the information on which he gets his double pay comes from the very men who have robbed the people in advance. They give him information on which he can sue. They prove the facts for him and he lets them keep the money they have stolen. That is the working of it. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota deprives these men of the power of forming combinations like this, and, as I said, it is the only amendment I have seen that is in the interest of the honest purchaser of a patent, who believes that he holds it in good faith, that he has bought it in good faith, and does not seek to sell it to anybody else.

When this question was up the other day I was amazed that the Senate of the United States should vote down an amendment like that, intended for no other purpose than to give relief, leaving to the genuine patentee the right to sue all manufacturers, vendors, and all other inventors; in short, all men who used his patent for merchandise, all the known violators of law. Let him deal with the vendors and manufacturers, instead of oppressing the mere user of things, and making combination with men whom he ought to sue. There are so many complicated suits and so many technicalities and so many unnecessary patents and so many fraudulent patents covering the same thing that these various patentees are afraid to sue each other. Perhaps they are all wrong, and somebody else has a better right than any of them have; and they avoid all this by following the thing into the hands of the person who uses it, and dividing the profits among themselves. That is the main reason why I favor the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, and hope it will not be embarrassed by any other amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I have but a word to say in answer to the remarks of my friend the Senator from Kentucky. The letter which my friend has read shows that one-half the produce of the oil region is due to the inventions to which he refers.

Mr. BECK. There are twelve different patents for this thing.

Mr. WADLEIGH. But one-half the produce of the oil region, which is immense in value, not only to the individuals concerned in it but also to the country, is due to some dozen patented inventions; and that is spoken of as a very annoying thing to those gentlemen who could not get any oil at all but for those inventions. All the oil they get is due to patents. Now, this amendment of the Senator from Minnesota permits any one of those oil companies to go into the business of manufacturing these patented articles and using them themselves without paying a cent for them. The provision of the amendment applies to any case where the infringer "manufactured or applied the same for and to his own use." That is when an inventor has by years of toil and great expense accomplished an invention which gives to this country and to these oil-well owners millions upon millions of dollars annually, the Congress of the United States is asked to pass an amendment which allows the oil men to manufacture that invention and use it in their wells without paying a cent for it. Nothing could more forcibly show the injustice of the amendment in very many cases than a simple statement of this fact.

Another thing, Mr. President. If there is any such understanding or combination between the owners of patents as the Senator from Kentucky has charged, (and I presume that neither he nor the correspondent of the Senator from Pennsylvania would charge it if it could not be proved,) that is a complete defense to any suit the patentee may bring. Such a conspiracy would operate as a license, and proof of it would furnish a complete answer to any suit by the patentee. More than all that, such an arrangement would constitute a criminal conspiracy punishable at common law and by statute in nearly all the States of this Union. If proved, an indictment would lie for it and the conviction of the guilty parties could be secured.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. WADLEIGH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when Mr. KIRKWOOD'S name was called.) On this question my colleague, who is absent, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] is paired with the Senator from Maryland. [Mr. DENNIS.] My colleague would vote nay and the Senator from Maryland would vote yea.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Anthony,	Conkling,	Kernan,	Sargent,
Barnum,	Davis of Ill.,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Booth,	Eaton,	Morrill,	Wadleigh,
Burnside,	Garland,	Patterson,	Whyte,
Chaffee,	Hoar,	Rollins,

NAYS—24.

Allison,	Grover,	McCreery,	Mitchell,
Bailey,	Harris,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Beck,	Hereford,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Hill,	Matthews,	Thurman,
Davis of W. Va.,	Howe,	Maxey,	Windom,
Ferry,	Johnston,	Merrimon,	Withers.

ABSENT—33.

Armstrong,	Conover,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Dennis,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Dorsey,	Kirkwood,	Spencer,

Cameron of Pa.,	Eustis,	McDonald,	Wallace.
Cameron of Wis.,	Gordon,	Oglesby,
Christiancy,	Hamlin,	Paddock,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the amendment is acted upon, I should like to propose an amendment to it, which I know will meet the concurrence of my friend from New Hampshire, to add to the end of the section:

This provision shall not apply to purchases from foreign manufacturers or dealers.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Let me ask the Senator from Minnesota to accept this instead:

Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to articles manufactured outside of the United States.

Mr. WINDOM. I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota as modified.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to favor the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, and yet before I sit down I desire to suggest one amendment that I hope he will accept.

I think this amendment as now modified will to a large degree protect innocent purchasers who buy an article patented, for their own use and not for sale, from those petty litigations which are complained of. The amendment is quite in the spirit of the laws of many of the States, my own included, whereby persons are protected from trifling assault and battery suits, trifling slander suits, and other suits of that character, which cannot be brought in the courts that are not courts of record, and yet our laws provide that if they do not recover $50 or more they do not get what are called costs. Where they recover nominal damages they get no more costs than damages by those State laws. If a man sues for an assault upon his person which is of a trifling character, and the jury give him six cents, as they must give something, he gets no more costs than damages. In a word, he has to pay his own costs; and that relieves us from a great deal of litigation.

So I think here that we may justly enact that where a man buys a machine or an article patented in public market, buys it from those who are selling it in business, merely for his own use, if the patentee sees fit to sue that man and does not get $20 damages he should not get any costs at all, and if he gets merely nominal damages, I think he can very well be made to pay the costs. Yet I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to an amendment which I desire to have made to his amendment, and it is to strike out from and including the word "or," in the sixth line, to and including the word "or," in the seventh line, after the word "manufactured." You will observe that it stands now that if a man finds that his neighbor has invented a very valuable machine and got a patent for it he may build one for his own use, and use it and defy him. I do not think that is quite right. I will read it both ways. It now reads:

In any suit brought in any court now having jurisdiction in patent cases for an alleged infringement of any patented article, device, process, invention, or discovery, where it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same from the manufacturer thereof, or from a person or firm engaged in the open sale or practical application thereof, or that he manufactured or—applied the same for and to his own use.

Where he makes one himself—

If you strike that out—

Mr. WINDOM. Let me understand the Senator distinctly. I do not know what words he wishes to strike out.

Mr. KERNAN. I propose to strike out from the word "or," at the end of line 6, to and including the word "or," in line 7, striking out "or that he manufactured or." It will leave it, then, I think, protecting everybody that ought to be protected, because I do not think a man, where his neighbor has invented a machine, should be shielded if he builds one of these expensive manufactured articles for himself and escape paying costs. So it seems to me; and with that clause left out I think this amendment will protect all who buy in the market for their own use. I will read it as it would read if this were stricken out:

Where it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same from the manufacturer thereof, or from a person or firm engaged in the open sale or practical application thereof, and—

Inserting the word "and" in place of the words stricken out—and applied the same for and to his own use, and not for sale nor for making a product for sale.

Then the costs shall be as specified. In a word, I desire to protect not a man who will manufacture for his own use a patented article, but one who buys it for his own use in the market from those manufacturing and selling it openly. I think he should be protected, as the amendment does protect him, from petty litigation for the infringement. Therefore I suggest the amendment in the interest of making this section so that it will protect all those who buy in the market for their own use against costs.

Mr. WINDOM. I rather think the Senator is right.

Mr. KERNAN. I hoped the Senator would agree with me. With that amendment I feel that I can very properly, as I shall, vote for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I accept the amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I am glad that amendment is proposed and accepted. It removes the objection I just now made in the case of an oil-well owner. It also prevents the manufacture by large companies engaged in manufacturing patented articles that they use in their business, while the amendment as it was originally drawn would protect them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is modified accordingly. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear the amendment read as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read as follows;

SEC. —. In any suit brought in any court now having jurisdiction in patent cases for an alleged infringement of any patented article, device, process, invention, or discovery, where it shall appear that the defendant purchased the same in good faith from the manufacturer thereof, or from a person or firm engaged in the open sale or practical application thereof, and applied the same for and to his own use, and not for sale nor for making a product for sale, if the plaintiff shall recover a judgment for merely nominal damages, the court shall adjudge that he pay all the costs of the suit; and if the plaintiff shall not recover the sum of $20 or over, the court shall adjudge him to pay his own costs, unless it shall also appear that the defendant at the time of such purchase, manufacture, or practical application had knowledge or actual notice of the existence of such patent: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to articles manufactured outside the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which in no way conflicts with the integrity of the bill and will not affect any other branch of the subject disposed of in all the sections of this bill. It is in reference solely to the matter of limitation. Under the law as it now stands, there is no period of time which bars the right of a party to recover for an infringement upon a patent during the life of the patent. After the expiration of the patent there is by the act of 1870, I think, a provision that no suit shall be brought at the end of six years. Under the act of 1870 there was a provision that no suit should be brought after six years subsequent to the expiration of the patent, but my friend from New Hampshire informs me that that is one of the casi omissi of the Revised Statutes. It is left out, so that there is to-day no limitation whatever to the period of time when a party can bring a suit for an infringement of his patent. The committee have therefore introduced a new element in the patent system, that of a statute of limitations. Probably that is correct; but the difficulty with me is as to the period; the time seems to be too short—four years.

The committee recognize the necessity of allowing a sufficient length of time for a party to maintain his patent in the circuit court; but that does not strike me to be ample enough to protect him. He may have his case tried in the circuit court after two or three years of effort; it may be decided against him, and he may be compelled to take the case to the Supreme Court of the United States. Well we know that in the crowded condition of that court's docket it takes a man at least two years to get a case tried there, so that it will require at least, in a thoroughly contested case, six years for the final adjudication of the patentee's right. I move, therefore, to give the party ample time to maintain his patent, that on line 6 of the first section the word "four" be stricken out and "six" inserted in lieu of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. WHYTE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Barnum,	Dennis,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Burnside,	Eaton,	Morrill,	Wadleigh,
Butler,	Edmunds,	Rollins,	Whyte.
Davis of Illinois,	Kernan,	Sargent,

NAYS—25.

Allison,	Dawes,	McCreery,	Saunders,
Beck,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Sharon,
Booth,	Garland,	Maxey,	Windom,
Cameron of Pa.,	Gordon,	Merrimon,	Withers.
Chaffee,	Grover,	Mitchell,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Morgan,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hereford,	Ransom,

ABSENT—36.

Anthony,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Paddock,
Armstrong,	Conover,	Jones of Florida,	Patterson,
Bailey,	Dorsey,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Bayard,	Eustis,	Kellogg,	Randolph,
Blaine,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Saulsbury,
Bruce,	Hill,	McDonald,	Spencer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	McPherson,	Teller,
Christiancy,	Howe,	Matthews,	Thurman,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Oglesby,	Wallace.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I now call up the bill (S. No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation.

Mr. SPENCER. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that the bill had better be read. It has not been read yet.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It has not been read. I simply want it taken up for consideration, and I agreed with the Senator from Rhode Island, who is not now in his seat, my colleague, [Mr. ANTHONY,] that I would yield the remainder of the day to the Calendar, and to-morrow morning I will ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the bill. I merely want to get it up to-day and have it left as unfinished business for to-morrow.

I will now, in the absence of my colleague, move that this order be laid aside temporarily and that the Calendar be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection such will be the order of the Senate. The bill is laid aside temporarily and will come up as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to take up the Calendar. Is there objection? There is no objection made.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Under the rule of my colleague, of course, allowing five minutes' debate and objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding. The bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell is first in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that that bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. McCREERY. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HOAR. What is the pending motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending motion is to indefinitely postpone the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Is the bill before the Senate in any parliamentary way?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It came up regularly.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the majority report was a report to indefinitely postpone a petition, and that there is no bill before the Senate except that the minority have moved to substitute one for the majority report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood from the Secretary that it is a bill which is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe a single objection carries the bill over. If so, I object, and that will carry over this question. Let us go on with the Calendar.

Mr. McCREERY. If the Senator from West Virginia insists upon that objection, I shall move for the postponement of all other orders and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill. It has been delayed four or five years. We have now reached it upon the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I made the objection in the interest of the Senator from Kentucky. If I am mistaken, of course I will withdraw it. The Senator from Minnesota, I understood, had moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. McCREERY. We want that motion rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then let me say to my friend from Kentucky that if the Senator from Minnesota or any other Senator makes an objection that carries the bill over.

Mr. McCREERY. It will have that effect unless I make the motion I have indicated and get the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am with the Senator from Kentucky and do not want to interfere with him. So if he prefers to take the vote, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understood the bill was before the Senate for its action.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill is before the Senate according to the regular rule and order of business. It was reached upon the Calendar. The majority and minority reports were read, and the hour expired, when the Senate proceeded to the regular order of business of the day. I understand the Senate has now taken up the Calendar again. If so, Senate bill No. 855 is the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. McMILLAN. And under those circumstances I interposed the motion to indefinitely postpone the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is entirely in order, and the yeas and nays have been ordered on that motion.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Cameron of Pa.,	Edmunds,	Morrill,	Wadleigh,
Christiancy,	Ferry,	Rollins,	Windom.
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Sargent,
Dawes,	McMillan,	Saunders,

NAYS—30.

Beck,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Morgan,
Booth,	Garland,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Bruce,	Gordon,	McCreery,	Spencer,
Burnside,	Grover,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Harris,	Matthews,	Whyte,
Chaffee,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Withers.
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Merrimon,
Dennis,	Kellogg,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—32.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Howe,	Patterson,
Anthony,	Coke,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Armstrong,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Randolph,
Bailey,	Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Barnum,	Dorsey,	Kirkwood,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Eustis,	McDonald,	Teller,
Blaine,	Hamlin,	Oglesby,	Thurman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill,	Paddock,	Wallace.

So the Senate refused to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. McCREERY. I did not hear the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not make any motion. I objected to the further consideration of the bill at the present time.

Mr. McCREERY. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed with the consideration of the claim of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone all prior orders and proceed with the consideration of the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. EDMUNDS. First I make the point of order that he can only move to postpone all prior orders under the rules, and then what the Senate will take up next remains to be determined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Vermont is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I am, sir.

Mr. McCREERY. I submit the motion according to the ruling of the Chair, to postpone all prior orders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask that the question be stated. I do not understand what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to state the question. The motion is that the Senate postpone all prior orders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The intention being then to move to take up the Mitchell bill.

Mr. BECK. I wish to understand the exact position of affairs. Is there any objection to proceeding with the present matter?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes; the Senator from Vermont objected.

Mr. BECK. I did not hear that. The objection is simply to taking it up. Is that it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The objection was made under what is called the Anthony rule, under which one objection carries a bill over. That being the effect and we going on with the Calendar, the Senator from Kentucky, the colleague of my honorable friend, as he had a perfect right to do, moves to postpone all pending orders. That being done he gives notice he intends to move to take up this bill. He has a right to do that.

Mr. BECK. Would an objection, therefore, generally to the consideration of any further business on the Calendar dispose of the Calendar? I think if we are going on in this way, if we cannot act on cases when we reach them, I shall make a general objection to every other case on the Calendar and then go back and begin again.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that his motion be to lay aside temporarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That motion is not in order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If it was in order I think it would be better. I shall oppose this motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has moved to lay all prior orders on the table, and on that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The roll-call having been concluded, Mr. MITCHELL asked that his name be called, and voted in the affirmative.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] on this question. A memorandum of the pair was left with me.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not so understand it; but if the Senator says so of course I shall so consider it. He spoke to me about it, but I understood the arrangement was not concluded. I will, however, withdraw my vote.

Mr. MATTHEWS, (after having voted in the negative.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] who is absent. I am informed he would vote "yea" if he were here; I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bailey,	Garland,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Beck,	Gordon,	McCreery,	Voorhees,
Booth,	Grover,	Maxey,	Whyte,
Bruce,	Harris,	Merrimon,	Withers.
Chaffee,	Hereford,	Morgan,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Eaton,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Howe,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Sargent,
Burnside,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Wadleigh,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Morrill,	Windom.

ABSENT—31.

Armstrong,	Conover,	Jones of Nevada,	Patterson,
Barnum,	Dennis,	Kirkwood,	Randolph,

Christiancy,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Thurman,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Oglesby,	Wallace.
Coke,	Johnston,	Paddock,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All prior orders are postponed.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when Mr. TELLER's name was called.) The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is absent in South Carolina. He is paired on this question with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL.] If the Senator from Colorado were here, he would vote "nay."

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to say before the result of the vote is announced that my colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is absent on public business and is paired on political questions, I believe, with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] I merely make this statement with reference to the absence of my colleague.

Mr. GARLAND, (who had voted "yea.") I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] as stated by his colleague, on all political questions; and if the Senator now on the floor will announce before the Senate that this is a political question, I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wished to state as to my colleague that he is absent and paired on political questions with the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not see any politics in this question, Mr. President, but if the Senator from Iowa now on the floor or any other Senator on the other side, or who has voted against the motion will say it is a political question, I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. MERRIMON, (who had voted "yea.") I will state that I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on political questions. If this is to be treated as a political question, I will observe my pair. I cannot conceive that it is a political question, for I think it is very probable I shall vote against the measure myself.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bailey,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Beck,	Grover,	McCreery,	Voorhees,
Booth,	Harris,	Maxey,	Whyte,
Butler,	Hereford,	Merrimon,	Withers.

Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Plumb,
Chaffee,	Hoar,	Rollins,

ABSENT—29.

Armstrong,	Conover,	Kirkwood,	Randolph,
Barnum,	Dorsey,	McDonald,	Spencer,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should like to hear the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] who has charge of this bill, it never having been referred to a committee, explain to us at length the grounds upon which he thinks the bill ought to pass.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have endeavored to explain to the Senator from Vermont and other Senators the ground upon which I think the bill ought to pass in the minority report which is printed and on the table of the Secretary. But in addition to what I said in that report, or in repetition of it, I will say that the books of the Treasury Department show that there is a fund there, the net proceeds of the sale of a lot of cotton that was taken from the possession of Warren Mitchell, this claimant, at Savannah, Georgia, in 1864. The papers in the case show that Warren Mitchell bought and paid for this cotton; that it was seized by the agents of the Government, it was shipped to New York, it was sold and a large proportion of it consumed in the expenses of shipment, commissions, and other charges. The net proceeds, however, are in the Treasury of the United States.

The claimant brought suit in the Court of Claims to recover the proceeds of the sale of this cotton. The Court of Claims were equally divided upon the question as to whether or not the purchase and payment for this cotton vested a legal title in the claimant, it being alleged as the claimant at the time of the purchase was a citizen of a loyal State and his vendors were citizens of confederate States disloyal the enemy relation existed. The Court of Claims were equally divided upon that question, which resulted in the dismissal of the petition; from which the claimant appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court decided that Warren Mitchell being a resident citizen of the State of Kentucky, a loyal State, having purchased this cotton from citizens of Georgia, a disloyal State, the enemy relation existed between the vendor and vendee, and under the laws of nations no title was communicated by reason of the fact that the contract was void. Hence, the Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the Court of Claims. The claimant then presented his petition here.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to call his attention to a fact? As he is making a statement of the case I ask him to make it full. He stated that the Court of Claims were equally divided upon the legal question involved. Is it not true that the Supreme Court determined the question against the claimant without division?

Mr. HARRIS. I have stated the fact that the Supreme Court decided the one single question that the enemy relation existed between vendor and vendee, and, by reason of that fact, the contract of purchase and of payment for this cotton was void. That was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United State, and no more than that.

I undertake to say that there is not a Senator on this floor who will deny these facts. Warren Mitchell bought and paid for the cotton. It was his by every consideration of justice, equity, and of moral right. The earnings of his life are to-day wrapped up in the proceeds of the sale of the cotton which was seized and taken from his possession, shipped to New York and sold, and the proceeds are in the Treasury of the United States to-day. That he bought it, that he paid for it, that the money is now in the Treasury, no Senator will deny.

I will venture to say in addition that there is not a Senator upon this floor who will controvert the conclusion that, under the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States in a number of cases, if Warren Mitchell had been the commanding general of the confederate armies at the time of this purchase and a resident of one of the Confederate States——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Instead of furnishing them with pork.

Mr. HARRIS. I am obliged to the Senator from Vermont for his kindly suggestion and the kindly manner in which it is made. In reply to the kindly suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, I beg him to look to the decision of the Supreme Court, and to answer as to whether or not the question of loyalty or disloyalty is a consideration that is weighed under the policy of this Government as expounded by its laws, when decided by the Supreme Court. The question of loyalty or disloyalty is wholly immaterial as a question of right, as held by the Supreme Court in the case of Pargoud vs. the United States, cited in the minority report.

But I was going on to say, when the Senator from Vermont made his kindly suggestion, that if Mr. Mitchell had been the commanding general of the confederate army and had brought this suit in the Court of Claims at the precise time that he did, and under the same circumstances, and upon exactly the same facts, the Supreme Court would have been bound to have decided and would have decided the case in his favor. The only reason that it was decided against him in the Court of Claims and in the Supreme Court was because he was a resident of a loyal State and technically held to be a loyal man, while the resident of a disloyal State was technically held to be a disloyal man, and hence the enemy relation existed between them.

The plain question in the case, for I do not propose to detain the Senate, narrows itself down to this: Can this Government afford to rest itself upon the cold technical question that notwithstanding this citizen has put the earnings of his life into this particular property and it is now in the Treasury of the United States, yet the enemy relation existing between him and the other contracting party at the time he bought the cotton he acquired no such legal title as he can enforce in the courts? Will any Senator claim that the Government has any title to the cotton; that there is a single fact or circumstance in the case that gives to the Government the title to one single pound of that cotton, or to a cent of the proceeds of its sale? I venture to say that there is not a Senator on this floor who will undertake to assert the title of the Government to the money that is now in the Treasury, the proceeds of the sale of this cotton, or its right to one pound of the cotton that resulted in those proceeds? If the contract of purchase was void because of the existence of the enemy relation between the contracting parties, it left the legal title in the vendor. The vendor has received the money of this claimant for the cotton. He asserts no title, presents no claim; he is satisfied, having been fully paid by the claimant for it. Yet, under the strict rule of law the legal title is in him, and but for the statute of limitations, under the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States, the vendors could to-day go into your Court of Claims and compel the payment of the proceeds of the sale of the cotton to them, notwithstanding the fact that they had sold to this claimant and received payment. I do not think the Government can afford to stand upon that cold technical rule and to withhold from a citizen the earnings of his whole life. For myself I will say that I will certainly vote to return to the claimant this money because it justly and rightfully belongs to him.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, this claim received the very careful consideration of the Committee on Claims of the Senate, to which the petition of the claimant was referred at a former session. From the examination of the facts touching the claim which I was then called upon to make as a member of that committee, and which I did make, my conclusion is that if there has been a claim presented to Congress which should be rejected it is this one. The claim is a large one, the amount claimed being $128,692.

The facts upon which the claim is based are stated in the report of the committee recommending that the claim be disallowed. Mr. Warren Mitchell, the claimant, was a member of two mercantile firms, doing business prior to the war in the city of Louisville, Kentucky; the firm of Mitchell & Armstrong, and the firm of Armstrong & Co. Charles Q. Armstrong, Warren Mitchell, the claimant, and Isaac Russell constituting these firms. The business of these firms seems to have been largely with the extreme Southern States, principally the Gulf States. The indebtedness in the South to these two firms at the time of the breaking out of the rebellion amounted to not more than $116,421. In pursuing the history of these firms it is found that Mr. Armstrong turned up first during the rebellion in Tennessee, engaged as a subcontractor under a party who had made a contract with the southern confederacy to supply it with certain provisions—pork and other articles. The next heard of him is in one of the Gulf States, where he died; and the next event noticed is his death. At what time he passed through the lines of the United States Army nowhere appears, but one fact is clearly inferable, that his sympathies before and at the breaking out of the war were with the southern confederacy; and the subsequent fact of his presence fulfilling a contract with the confederate government to furnish it supplies of pork for its army proves that he was disloyal at the very commencement of the war.

Mr. Mitchell obtained a pass from General Anderson to go through the lines of the armies of the United States shortly after the breaking out of the rebellion, early in the summer of 1861. It was nothing but a simple pass, no permit in any way, although it is stated that there was a verbal understanding that it was the purpose of Mr. Mitchell's visit to the South to collect debts due the firms of which he was a member.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what he professes?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the profession, but the fact does not appear in the papers, as I understand. Mr. Mitchell proceeded through the lines and engaged, as he alleges, in the collection of the debts due these two firms. But shortly after his exodus from the North he is found in Nashville, Tennessee, superintending actively and engaged in the performance of the subcontract entered into by his partner, Mr. Armstrong, to supply the confederate government with pork and other articles. He alleges that he was informed that this contract having been made by his partner he was bound to fulfill it, and under that impression, although personally he was not in favor of the contract, he rendered his services under the contract in the performance of its terms.

Mr. Mitchell is supposed to be an intelligent merchant, and in the presence of such a contract, with his knowledge that an act of that kind upon the part of a citizen of a northern State was an act of treason, he yet undertook to perform this contract, and he sets up here as a defense that he supposed it would have to be performed because his partner had made it. It is utterly preposterous to suppose that Mr. Mitchell did not understand the character of his act in the performance of that subcontract, and to suppose that he did not by so doing lend aid and support to the rebellion then flagrant in the country. It is true that subsequently, when he returned to the North, a pardon was granted to him, a general pardon, for any act he might have committed during the rebellion. But that does not alter his relation to this claim, nor does it alter the attitude of this question as it is presented to us in the Senate to-day. Besides, Mr. Mitchell did not return to the North, so far as appears by the papers, until after the rebellion closed. Having with this pass from General Anderson passed into the Confederate States, he remained there during the whole period of the war, engaged, as he says, in collecting debts due to the two firms of which he was a member. It appears, as I have already stated, that the indebtedness to those two firms amounted to $116,000, and the cotton which he alleges was taken, and for which his claim is here presented, amounts in value to $128,000, $12,000 more than the whole indebtedness which he claims and which the papers show was due to both the firms of which he was a member.

This cotton, then, could not have been taken merely in the collection of debts. The evidence shows that Mr. Mitchell spent that whole time in trading, in going from point to point, passing from Louisiana around through the Gulf States, and into Savannah, before he came North, engaged all that period in exchanging cotton or in buying and selling cotton and in making profit on cotton during the war. Yet he claims here to be a loyal man!

The proof shows that in the transportation of a portion of this cotton from one point to another in the South the officials of the railroad corporations had an interest in the cotton. It is plainly inferable from the facts and the testimony here that Mr. Mitchell spent that whole period in transacting business for his own profit, in buying and selling cotton, and in giving aid to the confederacy in the war which was then transpiring; and he made a profit, according to his own statement, upon this amount of cotton alone, of more than $12,000, taking the whole as having been collected in the payment of the indebtedness; but it is reasonable to suppose that a large portion of this cotton was purchased by him, and was not received in the payment of debts.

Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has stated the history of this case in the courts. It is true that this claim was before the Court of Claims, and that the question passed upon there was whether Mitchell acquired a title to this cotton, he being nominally a resident of a loyal State and having procured the cotton from those who were in rebellion. The Court of Claims equally divided upon that question and the case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court, that high tribunal, as we should reasonably anticipate, decided without division that no title passed to Mitchell. But it is claimed by the Senator from Tennessee that that is a mere technical question. The Senator remarked, if I recollect his words aright, that by all the principles of justice, equity, and morality the cotton was Mitchell's and that the question of title was a mere technical one, because under the law of nations he being a citizen of a loyal State could not trade with the enemy. Upon what principle is that law based? It is based upon the principle that a loyal citizen has no right to deal with an enemy; but here the application of the law is not as between foreign nations, for this was a rebellion in which the citizens of this country were involved on either side. If the rebellion was right, then the armies of the South were right. If it was treason, then the citizen of the North who would deal with the enemy violated all the principles of honor, all the principles of patriotism, and the technical question is resolved into one of great moral right. The man who lent his aid to the southern army was committing treason against his country, and the fact that no title passed shows that the principle of the law is sound and that there is no merit in the claim of Mitchell as he presents it here.

We had recognized the southern confederacy as a belligerent power and the principles of the law of war applied to it as such; but the relations of the citizens of the same country were qualified greatly by the fact that this was a war between portions of the same country and not a war between this nation and a foreign nation. Mr. Mitchell knew that the existence and welfare of the country under whose benign laws he had been protected and aided in accumulating a fortune were about to be destroyed, and, nominally a loyal citizen, he deserts his own country and goes over to those who are in rebellion. Property acquired under those circumstances is said by the Senator from Tennessee to be property a title to which Mitchell had a right in justice, in equity, in morality. I apprehend that the law affirmed by the courts is in accordance with all the principles of equity, justice, and morality.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question or two, for I have not determined how I shall vote on this bill, and his answer may have some effect on my vote? I ask him, first, if he objects to the payment of this claim because of the fact that after Mitchell had permission to enter the confederate lines he became somewhat in league with the confederate authorities? Is that the reason why the Senator opposes the claim?

Mr. McMILLAN. I oppose the claim because——

Mr. EATON. Perhaps I ought to ask one other question. Suppose my friend, the Senator from Minnesota, who was a loyal man, about whose loyalty there can be no question, had a claim against my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] for $50,000. It formed his estate. He was desirous if possible to get that money. He received permission to go into the confederate lines from the Federal authorities. He received permission from the confederate authorities to remain within the lines of the confederacy. He found his debtor. He received from him the sum of $50,000 in gold, I will say, instead of cotton. On his return the Federal Commander-in-Chief took from him his gold. Now, then, I beg to ask if that could be held in that case by the courts to be a valid seizure?

Mr. McMILLAN. The case stated by the Senator from Connecticut is wholly different from the case under consideration.

Mr. EATON. I ask the Senator's opinion on that case.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am replying now to the position of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. EATON. I should like to have an answer to my question. If my friend had received this permission from the Federal authorities and had received payment for his claim, would the Federal commander of the department have the power to take from him that money?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is a case not in point at all, and upon which there is no necessity or propriety in expressing an opinion at this time.

Mr. EATON. I think it is in point, and thinking it in point I should like a reply.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will observe that Mr. Mitchell in this case passed through the lines, and, as I have endeavored to show, engaged in giving aid and support to the southern confederacy by actually engaging in the performance of a contract to supply the confederate government with pork and other supplies, his partner, who was also in the South, having made the contract. The case the Senator from Connecticut supposes is totally different. In this case all the indicia go to show that so far as Mr. Mitchell did anything in the South at all it was in aid of the southern confederacy. The fact is plainly inferable, it seems to me, not that he engaged in the South in collecting his debts merely, but that he engaged in the sale and in the purchase of cotton, because he passed from one part of the South to the other. The cotton seized was all in Savannah, and if he received any cotton in the payment of his debts it was not this identical cotton which was seized by the Government. It appears, as I have already said, that the amount of cotton for which he claims payment is greater in value than the whole amount of indebtedness due to both the firms, so that he must have engaged in trading with the enemy.

This case was before the Senate at a prior Congress. A favorable report was made upon it by the Committee on Claims, and it came before the Senate for action. Before the case was finally disposed of, however, in the examination of another claim before the same committee, the fact of Mitchell's engaging actively in the performance of a contract to supply the confederate government with pork was developed. That was the first information the Committee on Claims had upon that subject; and, upon that state of facts, after considerable discussion upon the matter, the bill was referred again to the committee for re-examination, and so disposed of for that Congress.

The Senator from Tennessee attempts to illustrate the mere technicality, as he terms it, in this case as to the title of the cotton by saying that if the cotton had belonged to a member of the confederacy his title to it would have been complete. In that case the transaction would have been wholly different. The citizens of the South were recognized enemies. They had a right to do what they pleased with their cotton. So far as the law of nations is concerned affecting this question, they had a right to render allegiance to the government which they claimed to have set up, and there was no disloyalty to that government on their part, there was no treason to their government in purchasing cotton or in trading between their own citizens. We had recognized them as belligerents and given them the rights of war. But Mitchell left his own country, he left the Government that had protected him, and went to render aid and comfort to the enemy. In various forms, at various times through the whole war, he spent his time in aiding that confederacy, and when it terminated against the government there attempted to be set up, when this cotton was seized by the Federal Army, then he comes in and claims to be a loyal man. Why, Mr. President, a claim so utterly without foundation I think cannot be pointed to in the annals of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Where is the legal title to that cotton or to the proceeds?

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not in Warren Mitchell.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell me where it is?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Government of the United States has seized that property as a prize of war. Mr. Mitchell not only has no title to it technically, but he has no title to it under any view of the case you can take.

Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for my own enlightenment?

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. BOOTH. Would this cotton have been liable to seizure and confiscation if it still remained in the hands of Mitchell's vendors?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir; because his vendors were engaged in supporting the rebellion; they were citizens of the confederacy. That is the difference between his vendors and himself. They were doing acts which we recognized as being proper on their part to their own government.

Mr. BOOTH. But the question that I asked went to this effect: Would the United States have derived any different title by the seizure of the cotton in the hands of Mitchell's vendors from what they did by its seizure in Mitchell's hands?

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend from Minnesota allow me to propound a question to the Senator from California which perhaps will be an answer to his? Would he apply the same rule to a loyal citizen who went down and engaged in contraband trade with the enemy, and confirm a title gained by such a trade, in all cases where he would not have seized the property in the hands of a rebel? That is the point in this case.

Mr. BOOTH. I am not answering questions. I put one.

Mr. HOAR. This petitioner asks Congress to confirm a title which is void, because he was engaged in a contraband trade with his country's enemy, and he says, "You would not take the property away from an enemy under the circumstances, therefore confirm my illicit trade."

Mr. EDMUNDS. You always would take contraband of war from an enemy if you could take it, as Sherman did with his army after considerable trouble.

Mr. HOAR. That is another thing.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, in any view I can take of this claim, if I have correctly understood the facts here, (and I have given diligent attention to them,) it is utterly without foundation; and if this relief is granted to this claimant it is a reward for treason. There can be no doubt of his duty to the Government of the United States. There is no doubt that if he performed these acts he was lending aid to the enemies of his own country, and property acquired by him in the very act of treason it is claimed here is his by all the rules of justice, equity, and morality! I am unable to see the subject in any such light, and I trust the Senate will refuse to pass this bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think this whole case is in a nutshell, where it is properly understood, and it seems to me that it presents one single point, a point not presented, if I am right in my view, in the very ingenious and earnest argument of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] He has undertaken to discuss the question whether the United States would have taken and held under the circumstances disclosed in the report the property of a rebel, and he says if they would not certainly they ought not to take and hold the property of this petitioner, concerning whom at least all you can say is that it is in doubt on the facts whether he was a rebel or not, and concerning whom the Senator from Tennessee affirms his belief that he was a loyal citizen.

Now, it seems to me that question is not presented by the case before the Senate. A citizen of a State not in rebellion got a pass—as it turned out an unauthorized pass, but that is not very important—from a general commanding a military district to go South and collect debts, and thereupon on that pass he went South, remained three years, traveling about in the rear of the rebel armies, as much at home within the rebel lines as the general of the confederate forces, and dealt, buying at one end of the confederacy and selling at the other, or selling at one end of the confederacy and buying at the other, in cotton, which was contraband of war, every one of those dealings being in violation of the law of war and the law of nations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And of the statute law of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. And of the law of the United States in such cases made and provided. Now, to violate the law which prohibits the citizen of a State from dealing with citizens of States at war with his own, has been for the first time within my knowledge spoken of as a technicality. It is not a technicality. It is one of the most important and necessary rules of public conduct for the the safety of States in time of imminent peril and danger.

This man acquired by that illegal course of business one hundred and twenty-eight thousand dollars' worth of cotton, or thereabouts, and when General Sherman captured Savannah he captured that cotton and took it as booty or prize of war, and its proceeds were paid into the Treasury of the United States, and now this petitioner comes in and says, "Pay me the proceeds of that cotton; you would not have taken it away from a rebel at war with you under the circumstances;" which I by no means admit, but that is his claim; "now pay it over to me." To which the reply is, "You have not the least title to it in the world and never had. The laws of your country and the laws of all civilized countries at war prohibited you getting any title to it by such a transaction;" and the petitioner says: "I know it; that is true; I do not pretend to dissent from that proposition the least in the world. This was a prohibited transaction; it was in violation of the laws of war; it gives me no title whatever to the cotton; but I was led to think I had got a title or might get one, and to enter upon this course of trade, by a pass which I got from General Anderson, under which I went down for the purpose of collecting these debts and paying them over to my northern creditors." Well, the reply in the first place is, "General Anderson never had any authority to grant you such a pass," and so says the court. The reply in the next place is, "The pass that he did grant you was simply a pass to go within the rebel lines, and did not purport to be a pass even to collect your debts or give you any authority to that; and further, if you had done and rightfully done all that, General Anderson never contemplated that you were to engage in this course of trading which the evidence discloses."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the same pass he would have given to an enemy to go to his own country.

Mr. HOAR. It is the same pass he would have given an enemy to go home to visit his wife and children or to visit his plantation, and that is all. But he says "I was a loyal citizen meaning well to my Government, and I was a loyal citizen who got into this difficulty which I admit I am in, and who did not get any title to this property, as I admit I did not, by means of a mistake which it is not becoming a great government to insist upon." The answer to that proposition, even if it had weight and if the Government could undertake to correct mistakes of that kind in time of war with any safety to anybody, is "We do not believe one word of that story." It is not credible that a man living in Kentucky, where men knew whether their neighbors desired that this rebellion should succeed, or desired that this rebellion should fail, was permitted to spend three years trading in cotton within the confederate lines, he being in heart and soul loyal to this Government all the time. It is one of those stories not to be taken by sane men as true upon evidence, that that man did these things which the evidence discloses—a Kentuckian, an eminent, influential Kentucky merchant at the beginning of the war, and the men in authority and in power within the confederate lines did not know whether he was a loyal Union-loving citizen or not!

In the next place "it is inconsistent with your own conduct, Mr. Mitchell, because while you were down there you were engaged for money, for profit, in giving aid and comfort to the rebellion, in providing provisions under a contract for the support of its army in the field." Now what has Mr. Mitchell to say in reply to that? Why, he says, "I did execute a very large and lucrative contract to supply pork to the confederate armies; but I did it because my partner, who was a rebel at heart, had taken the contract in my name and his own, and I found that I was bound by it in law, and thought I had better carry it out. We should lose money, we should be held to damages if we did not." In other words he says, "I, the Union-loving citizen, the intelligent merchant loving my country and hating rebellion all the time, helped feed those armies for pay, because I was afraid I should lose some money if I did not by being held to have broken a contract which my partner had undertaken to make in my behalf."

Sir, I do not think that the fear of losing some money by being adjudged to have broken his contract with the confederate government is an excuse for treason, for giving aid and comfort to the rebellion, on the part of the citizen of a loyal State to be made to the representatives of men who were not only willing to lose their property, but to lose their lives to put down that rebellion.

Mr. President, if a southern man on a like pass from a southern general had come north out of their lines and into ours, and had done these same acts for the Union Government, he would have been shot or hung within twenty-four hours after he got back, if he had gone back while the rebellion had its head erect; and, although this Government has considered that if it be not a justification it is at least an excuse to a man that he went with his State, that he stood by his neighbors, that he believed he was right in making war upon the Government, I do not think we have until now been even asked from that side of the Chamber to say that for a loyal man, belonging to a loyal State, professing to be loyal in sentiment, it is a good justification or even a tolerable excuse that he was afraid he would lose a little money if he did not give aid and comfort to the enemies of his country and its flag!

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I ask that this bill may be temporarily laid aside in order to appeal to the Senate to pass a little appropriation bill which the House is extremely anxious to have acted on to-day. I think it will not take five minutes, perhaps not three.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to yielding to the desire of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is too good a bill, it seems to me, to be laid aside informally. There is so much of justice and honor, and high considerations in it, that it is rather a pity. I wish my friend from Minnesota could wait. I do not mean to interpose an objection, but this is one of the occasions when we can show our forgetfulness of what has passed, and act for all the future, that I think we ought to go on with it. It is rather too good to be lost just now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not think this appropriation bill will occupy any time. It is absolutely necessary to pass it.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the appropriation bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The portion I feel interested in is to get money appropriated so that the committee appointed by the other House may go to Chicago to make an investigation.

Mr. WINDOM. I think there is no objection. The Senator from Vermont does not object; he only thinks he ought to object, to carry out his convictions this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This bill ought not to be delayed by any such thing as appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Vermont to object?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I do not object to the Committee on Appropriations at any time.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed to report back the bill with amendments which I shall offer after the bill is read.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 6141) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes and to appropriate $40,000 for the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the expense of the transportation of coin and bullion $60,000 is appropriated. That the charges for the transportation of gold coin from San Francisco to New York shall not exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent., and for the transportation of silver 1 per cent., and for intermediate points at proportionate rates corresponding to the distance.

To meet the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives, to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House, the sum of $40,000 is also appropriated.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee move to strike out the word "charges," in line 5, and insert "amount paid;" so as to read:

And that the amount paid for the transportation of gold coin, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I submit from the Committee on Appropriations an amendment to be added to the bill. We have ascertained from examination at the Secretary's office that there will be a deficiency to the extent named there in the last two cases, and that the amount mentioned in the first item will probably be needed before the close of the session, and this is probably the only opportunity we shall have to provide for it. The amendment is to add to the bill:

That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; which sum shall be placed to the credit of the contingent fund of the Senate, to be applied toward defraying the expenses of such investigations and inquiries as have already been, or may hereafter be, directed by the Senate duting the Forty-fifth Congress.

For expenses of the joint committee to take into consideration the subject-matter of reform and reorganization of the Army, $232.67.

For expenses of the joint committee to take into consideration the expediency of transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department, $953.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, the title was amended by adding "and for other purposes."

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. BRUCE. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to recommit to the Committee on Pensions the bill (H. R. No. 3575) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Da C. Thomas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the order will be entered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 26, noes 15; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 23, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to correct the Journal. In the title of the bill which I introduced yesterday to define and prescribe the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, in certain cases and for other kindred purposes, the word "for" is omitted before the words "other kindred purposes." I also observe that in the RECORD the words "Secretary of War" are inserted in the title, instead of "Secretary of the Treasury."

The SPEAKER. The necessary corrections will be made.

The Journal, as corrected, was approved.

SESSION FOR BUSINESS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask unanimous consent that there be a session of the House to-morrow evening at half past seven o'clock for the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE. Let it be understood that all points of order are reserved.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of course. If this session be ordered, the business from the Judiciary Committee will be considered subject to all the rules of the House. If there be no objection, the session as requested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] will be ordered.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

showing that vast sums of money are expended to maintain useless ports of entry, that the Treasury is depleted in millions annually to maintain these ports of entry at the expense of the tax-payers of the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, requested to report at the earliest day practicable a bill suspending or abolishing all ports of entry that are not self-sustaining.

DOCUMENTS IN HOUSE DOCUMENT-ROOM.

Mr. MONEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That hereafter no documents shall be delivered from the document-room of the House except upon the order of a member of the House or of the Senate.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SWANN. By instruction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday, February 4, after the reading of the Journal, may be devoted to the consideration of reports from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BRIDGES. I ask the gentleman who objected to withdraw his objection. There are some bills of importance before the Committee on Foreign Affairs which ought to be considered, among others the Japanese question.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is true that every committee of the House has a large amount of business in its hands. The Committee on Commerce could occupy two or three evening sessions; but if we assign so many special orders, there will be no regular call of committees for reports.

Mr. SWANN. I will state for the information of the gentleman who opposes this resolution that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will be able to dispose of the whole business before that committee in a very short time, and will not occupy more than one evening session.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. HALE. Then I insist on the regular order of business.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 39 and 44.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 48, and 50, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 12, with an amendment striking out lines 8 and 9, page 2 of the bill; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 24, and agree to the same, with an amendment striking out lines 24 and 25, page 12 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 49, and agree to the same, with an amendment adding, after the word "Hong-Kong," "Ottawa;" and the Senate agree to the same.

O. R. SINGLETON,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM WINDOM,
W. B. ALLISON,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SINGLETON. One word of explanation and then I am done. This conference report gives us the bill of last session and the law as it was passed, with the exception of an amendment, which was put on by this House, retaining the second secretaries of legation at Paris, Berlin, and London. The Senate requested there might be allowed transfer of clerks of certain consulates from one to another, but it does not increase the expense. So it is the bill of last session with the amendment the House made to it. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the conference committee was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to present certain executive and other communications.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 5808) to facilitate the refunding the national debt, without amendment, and a bill (H. R. No. 5313) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which concurrence was requested.

The message further announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. No. 420) for the relief of Major P. P. G. Hall; and

A bill (S. No. 195) to declare certain lands subject to taxation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. Is not the morning hour the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was granted unanimous consent to present certain executive and other communications, which will not take long. Besides, the morning hour is not the first business in order this morning, as the gentleman from Virginia has notified the Chair he would press the special order to-day.

ANTI-POLYGAMY LAW.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the memorial of Emmeline B. Wells and Zina Young Williams, of Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, asking for the repeal of the anti-polygamy law of 1862 and for legislation to protect the women and children of Utah Territory.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask that the paper be read.

The paper was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives
of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has declared the anti-polygamy law of 1862 to be in accordance with the Constitution; and

Whereas we, and Mormon women generally, previous to that decision implicitly believed that this law was in violation of the Constitution, which says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" and

Whereas under our present civilization we have a peaceful, prosperous, and healthful condition of society, our children are owned and supported by their fathers and are equally recognized as heirs to their father's estate, and our women are protected from the temptation to infanticide and kindred crimes; and

Whereas the enforcement of the law of 1862 would imprison our husbands, despoil and destroy our homes, render our children illegitimate before the world, and leave ourselves and many thousands of women desolate and unprotected; and

Whereas this example set by the United States would encourage mobs to violently assault and afflict us as in times past, when we were driven from State to State far out beyond the pale of this Republic; and

Whereas we went far out into the wilderness by the advice and at the suggestion of eminent leading American statesmen, that we might worship God according to the dictates of our own consciences, without fear or molestation, and at the same time extend to all, of whatever faith, the same precious privilege; and

Whereas, after the United States had taken possession of the land which our people had redeemed from the desert and made prosperous, and which the Mormon battalion under Colonel Philip St. George Cooke had, together with what is now known as California, Nevada, New Mexico, and Arizona, helped to conquer, President Fillmore, "by the advice and consent of the Senate," appointed Brigham Young, then a practical polygamist, governor of Utah, we had good reason to believe the Government would continue to protect us in our religious faith and its practice; and

Whereas harsh measures toward our people, such as destruction of families and homes, will have a tendency to drive many to desperation, while just and humane treatment will foster and strengthen love and affection for the Government, thereby securing a more peaceful issue of affairs now pending; and

Whereas we ourselves and a majority of our people are native-born citizens of the United States and desire to live in obedience to the laws of our country: Therefore

We pray your honorable body to repeal the anti-polygamy law of 1862; and

We further pray you to enact such legislation as will securely legitimatize our children and protect our names from dishonor by preserving unbroken the existing relationship of families which are already bound together by the strongest ties of affection and whose lives would be forever wrecked through separation; and

We further pray that in any future legislation concerning the marriage relation in any Territory under your jurisdiction you will consider the rights, the hearts, and the consciences of the women to be affected by such legislation, and that you will consider the permanent care and welfare of children as the sure foundation of the state.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

EMMELINE B. WELLS,
ZINA YOUNG WILLIAMS.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object to leave being given to report at any time. I do not object to the reference.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTI-POLYGAMY LAW.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a number of petitions for the enforcement of the anti-polygamy law referred to that Department by the President; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRODUCTS OF FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draught of a joint resolution for securing reports of the products of the fisheries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury supplementary to the deficiency estimates heretofore submitted; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SURVEY OF FLUSHING BAY, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of Lieutenant Colonel John Newton, Corps of Engineers, of the result of a survey of Flushing Bay, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SUSPENDED LAND ENTRIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting two lists of suspended entries of lands under the pre-emption laws acted on by the board established by section 2451 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SURVEYS OF SALEM RIVER, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of Colonel J. M. Macomb, Corps of Engineers, on the surveys of the Salem River, Woodbridge Creek, Elizabeth River, and Rahway River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the Senate, that the Senate agreed, with amendments, to the resolution of the House of Representatives for the printing of volumes 3, 8, and 13 of the final reports of the geological and geographical surveys of the Territories with the necessary illustrations.

The resolution and amendments of the Senate thereto were referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate for printing 15,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1877–'78, with illustrations; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

NARRATIVE OF POLARIS EXPEDITION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate for printing 1,000 copies of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition for sale by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, at the cost of publication with 10 per cent. added thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

WALKER'S STATISTICAL ATLAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate that the copies of Walker's Statistical Atlas heretofore ordered for the use of the two Houses of Congress be bound by the Public Printer; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEYS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the Senate, that the Senate had agreed, with amendments, to the resolution of the House of Representatives to print 3,000 copies of the Report of the Geological and Geographical Surveys of the Rocky Mountain Region, relating to the geology of the high plateaus of Utah, in quarto form, with the necessary illustrations and charts.

The resolution and amendments of the Senate thereto were referred to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the Senate, that the Senate had agreed, with amendments, to the resolution of the House of Representatives to print 3,000 copies of the Geographical and Geological Surveys of the Rocky Mountain Region, being volume 2, Contributions to North American Ethnology, in quarto form.

The resolution and amendments of the Senate thereto were referred to the Committee on Printing.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6143) making an appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I give notice that after the reading of the Journal on Saturday I shall make an effort to bring up this bill for action.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

FEDERAL CENSUS.

Mr. COX, of New York, from the Select Committee on the Census, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6144) to provide for taking the Federal census; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RYAN. I ask leave to present an amendment, which, when the bill just reported is considered, I propose to offer as the views of the minority. I ask that the amendments be printed with the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DOCTOR JUNIUS L. POWELL.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to report at this time a Senate bill from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GOODE. If it will take time, I must object.

Mr. BANNING. I think it will not take more than a few minutes. I ask leave to report back the bill (S. No. 1435) authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army.

The bill was read.

Mr. BREWER. I object to that bill.

Mr. BANNING. If the gentleman will allow me to explain for a moment, I think he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BREWER. I understand what it is, and I object.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HUBBELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back papers of the following titles, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, asking an appropriation for a steam fog-whistle at Foulweather Bluff;

Also, a report to accompany House bill 647, making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house at Little Traverse Bay, Michigan;

Also, a report to accompany House bill 5461, making an appropriation for the purchase of a site for the erection of a fog-signal on Sandy Point, Puget Sound, Washington Territory.

DOCTOR JUNIUS L. POWELL.

Mr. BREWER. I wish to withdraw my objection to the bill offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I renew the objection.

PUBLIC LANDS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill to apply the proceeds of the public lands to aid in the education of the people.

Mr. MILLS. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the order of the House upon the subject to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 10, 1879.

On motion of Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Thursday, January 23, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be assigned to the consideration of the bill from the Committee on Education and Labor, to apply the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the education of the people.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas now raises the question of consideration, and the Chair states that it is not competent for the gentleman to raise the question of consideration on this bill for the reason that the rule which gives him that right has been suspended by a vote of the House in fixing the consideration of this bill for to-day.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order. It is decided by the Speaker that a prior order of the House fixing the time for the consideration of a bill cannot be antagonized by any other order.

The SPEAKER. The order made by the House can be got rid of in two ways, either by laying the bill upon the table or by a motion to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to withdraw the objection I made to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.] I made it under a misunderstanding of the nature of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will at the first opportunity recognize the gentleman to withdraw it.

Mr. CALKINS. Do I understand the Chair to hold that the rules were suspended by reason of the order made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the fact is as the gentleman states it.

Mr. CALKINS. That the rules were suspended by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. They were suspended by unanimous consent; at least the order was made by unanimous consent, and that has always been held to be equivalent to a suspension of the rules, only with more force than when the rules are suspended by merely a two-third vote, because it was a unanimous vote.

Mr. MILLS. I want to know under what rule of the House the consideration of this bill will be conducted.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MILLS. Then what rules have we for the consideration of a bill and for debate upon it?

The SPEAKER. The ordinary rules of the House would apply after the House got into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLS. My understanding has always been that when a day was appointed for the consideration of a certain bill we suspended all the rules in the way of having that appointment made.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be considered under the rules of the House in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GOODE. Pending my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I move that all general debate be limited to one hour.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope that more time than that will be given for the discussion of so important a measure.

The SPEAKER. What limit does the gentleman from Minnesota suggest?

Mr. DUNNELL. I think two hours will be the least time that should be allowed.

Mr. GOODE. I accept that as an amendment.

Mr. MILLS. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER. To allow two hours.

Mr. MILLS. I move to limit the debate to ten minutes.

The question was taken on Mr. MILLS' amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I presume that the motion to limit does not affect the five-minute debate?

The SPEAKER. Certainly not; the motion is to close the general debate.

Mr. CONGER. Will it be in order to move to postpone the consideration of this question?

The SPEAKER. Not while this motion is pending.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the motion to go into Committe of the Whole were voted down would not that bring up the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It would.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 85, noes 100.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; 66 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 108, not voting 55; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOOKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3542) to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people, &c. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill has been limited to two hours.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the net proceeds of sales of public lands are hereby forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people: Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands, or the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain, or interfere with granting bounty-lands.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause an account to be taken upon the close of each fiscal year, and ascertain the total receipts from the sale or other disposition of the public lands of the United States, including all fees received at the general and district land offices during such year, and the amount of expenditures during said year incurred or occasioned by the survey, sale, location, entry, or other disposition of such lands, including appropriations for the expenses of the said officers, for said year, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the net cash proceeds from the sale, entry, location, or other disposition of such lands as aforesaid, after deducting expenses and expenditures.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion to the several States and Territories and to the District of Columbia, upon the basis of population of the said States and Territories between the ages of five and twenty-one years, the net proceeds of sales of public lands for the previous year: Provided, That after five years one-half of said net proceeds, and after ten years the whole of the same, shall be set apart as an educational fund, which said funds shall be invested in the bonds of the United States bearing a rate of interest not less than 4 per cent. per annum, both principal and interest payable in coin, the interest on such educational fund only to be appropriated as above provided: And provided further, That for the first ten years the distribution of said net proceeds, and the interest on said fund, to and among the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia, shall be made according to the numbers of their respective population, of ten years old and upward, who cannot read and write, as shown, from time to time, by the last preceding published census of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the first apportionment under this act shall be made on or before the 31st day of July, 1878; and each of said States and Territories shall be entitled to receive its distributive share of each apportionment, to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to its treasurer or other officer authorized by its law to receive the same, whenever thereafter it shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the law of such State or Territory accepting the provisions of this act, and undertaking that the funds provided by the same, whenever paid over to it as above provided, shall be faithfully applied to the free education of all its children, and to the endowment and support of such colleges as have been or may be hereafter established in accordance with the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862: Provided, That the Legislatures of said States and Territories shall have the power to determine whether any of said funds shall be given to said colleges and institutions of learning, and what amount thereof, the amount in no case to exceed one-half. The distributive share of the District of Columbia shall, from time to time, be paid over to the commission of said District created by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," or other officer or officers provided by law, and shall be applied in the same manner as above provided for the States and Territories.

SEC. 5. And if any State or Territory shall misapply, or allow to be misapplied or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory, and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made. And all apportionment so forfeited and withheld shall be added to, and become part of, the principal of the educational fund hereby created.

SEC. 6. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to affect in any manner the existing laws and regulations in regard to the adjustment and payment to States of the per centum of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their respective limits, as provided in section 3689 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Education and Labor was read, as follows:

In the fourth section strike out the following:

Provided, That the Legislatures of said States and Territories shall have the power to determine whether any of said funds shall be given to said colleges and institutions of learning, and what amount thereof; the amount in no case to exceed one-half.

And insert the following:

Provided, That one-fourth of the moneys appropriated by this act to the several States and Territories shall be given to the said colleges and institutions of learning, unless in any case the State Legislatures shall otherwise direct.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill are very plain and simple; and if the House will give me its attention for a few moments I will endeavor to explain them. The first section provides that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands shall be forever dedicated and set apart for the education of the people; but nothing in this section is to have the effect to repeal or impair or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of the public lands or their entry for homesteads, or in any manner to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain, or to interfere with the power of Congress to grant bounty lands.

The second section provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall take an account of the net cash proceeds from the sales of the public lands upon the close of each fiscal year. The third section provides that this fund shall be distributed to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population between the ages of five and twenty-one years. For the first five years the whole of the fund is to be distributed, after five years one-half thereof, and after ten years the whole is to be invested as a permanent educational fund in bonds of the United States bearing 4 per cent. interest, the interest only to be distributed. It is provided further that instead of a distribution upon the basis of population for the first ten years it shall be made upon the basis of illiteracy; that is, upon the basis of the number of persons ten years old and upward who are unable to read and write.

The fourth section provides that this fund shall be distributed to each of the States and Territories upon their filing with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the law of such State or Territory accepting the provisions of this act and stipulating that the fund so received shall be faithfully applied to the free education of all the children and to the endowment of the agricultural and mechanical colleges established under the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862. But a proviso is offered by the committee to the effect that one-fourth of this fund shall be given to the said agricultural and mechanical colleges, unless in any case the State Legislature shall otherwise direct.

The fifth section provides that if any State shall misappropriate or allow to be misappropriated the fund dedicated for this purpose, it shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment until the amount so misappropriated shall be replaced and a report made that it has been disposed of as required by this law.

The sixth section provides that nothing in the act shall interfere with existing rules and regulations in regard to the adjudication and payment of the per centum of the proceeds of sales of the public lands to the different States and Territories as provided for by section 3689 of the Revised Statutes.

The following statement, furnished at my request by the Bureau of Education, will show the amount which would accrue to each State and Territory if the distribution should be based upon the number of illiterate persons ten years old and upward, as reported in the census of 1870:

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that the sole object of this bill is the dedication of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the education of the people; and I assume that the bill must receive the indorsement and support of every gentleman on this floor if it can be made satisfactorily to appear that we have the constitutional power to do what the bill proposes, that the distribution provided for is a just and fair one and made in a proper manner, and that the object contemplated by this bill is wise and beneficent. Let us examine these propositions very briefly.

The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power—

To dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States.

This language is too broad and comprehensive to admit of any doubt whatever as to its proper interpretation. The history of the Government shows that from its foundation down to the present time the policy of making liberal donations of the public lands for educational purposes in the new States has been uniformly adhered to.

In the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1876 is to be found a full and complete review of the action of the General Government in extending aid to education. He says:

The policy of extending aid to education by grants from the General Government dates from a period anterior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

In 1785 Congress established "An ordinance for disposing of the lands in the Western Territory," which contained the following provision: "There shall be reserved the lot No. 16 of every township for the maintenance of public schools within the said township."

The "ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio," was adopted July 13, 1787. Article 3 contains the following clause: "Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged." What Congress meant by this clause is clearly defined in the act dated the twenty-third of the same month, empowering "the board of treasury to contract for the sale of western territory." Referring to the ordinance of 1785, it continues: "The lot No. 16 in each township, or fractional part of a township, to be given perpetually for the purposes contained in the said ordinance; * * * not more than two complete townships to be given perpetually for the purposes of a university, to be laid off by the purchaser or purchasers, as near the centre as may be, so that the same shall be of good land, to be applied to the intended object by the Legislature of the State." In the same year contracts which contained the above conditions were made under the above act for the sale to the Ohio company and to John C. Symes of large tracts of land within the limits of the present State of Ohio.

The policy thus inaugurated was not confined to the Northwest Territory. In the act approved March 3, 1803, providing for the disposal of lands belonging to the United States south of Tennessee, the reservation was made of lot No. 16 of each township and of an entire township for purposes of common-school and university education.

From that time until 1848, on the organization of each new Territory similar provisions were made for public education. In that year, on the organization of the Territory of Oregon, the quantity of land reserved for the benefit of common schools was doubled; and to each new Territory organized and State admitted since, except West Virginia, the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of every township, one-eighteenth of the entire area, have been granted for common schools.

To each State admitted into the Union since the year 1800, except Maine, Texas, and West Virginia, and to the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, and Washington, have been granted two or more townships of land, to endow a university. The States that received more than two townships, or 46,080 acres are Ohio, 69,120 acres, Florida and Wisconsin, 92,120 acres each, and Minnesota, 82,640 acres.

In 1862 the law granting lands to each State to endow colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts was enacted. The lands granted to the several States under this act aggregate 9,600,000 acres.

The State of Texas, on her admission into the Union, retained the title to her public land, and is consequently excepted from the grants to endow common schools and universities; but she shared the benefits of the act endowing colleges of agriculture, receiving as her share land scrip representing 180,000 acres.

Besides the general grants, there have been special grants of land and buildings to institutions of learning in several States and Territories, as follows:

	Acres.
Alabama.—Lafayette Academy	480
Connecticut.—Asylum for the education of the deaf and dumb	23,040
Dakota.—Holy Cross Mission	160
Florida.—Chattahoochee arsenal, buildings, land, &c., to State.
Georgia.—Dahlonega arsenal, grounds, buildings, &c., for agricultural college	10
Kentucky.—Asylum for the education of the deaf and dumb; benefit transferred to Centre College	22,400
Louisiana.—Pine Grove Academy, (quitclaim by United States)	4,040
Michigan.—Public schools, Sault de Ste. Marie	1.26
Michigan.—Public schools, Mackinac, lot and building.
Minnesota.—Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church	80
Mississippi.—Jefferson College, outlot at Natchez	30
Tennessee.—Fisk University, Nashville, land and buildings	3.25
West Virginia.—Storer College, four lots and buildings at Harper's Ferry.
Missouri.—Under acts of June 13, 1812, May 26, 1824, and January 27, 1831, confirming to inhabitants of certain towns certain outlots, commons, &c., for purposes of education, as follows:
Portage des Sioux	298.38
Saint Charles	68.79
Saint Louis	394.86
Saint Ferdinand	33.30
Villa A. Robert	12.39
Carondelet	37.10
Sainte Geneviève	561.68

The quantity of land thus granted, aside from lots the area of which is unknown, is 51,651.01 acres.

By an act of September 4, 1841, 500,000 acres of land were granted to each of the following States, for the purpose of internal improvement, namely: Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, and Missouri; and the same grant has been made to each State since admitted into the Union, except Texas and West Virginia. The quantity of land thus granted is 9,000,000 acres. Six of the States since admitted into the Union—California, Iowa, Kansas, Oregon,

Nevada, and Wisconsin—have set apart the proceeds of the sales of these lands, by provisions in their respective constitutions, for the benefit of free schools.

By an act dated April 18, 1806, the following grants of land for educational purposes were made to the State of Tennessee:

1. For two colleges, one to be established in East and one in West Tennessee, 100,000 acres. 2. For academies, one in each county, 100,000 acres.

It was provided that one thirty-sixth of the above grants should be reserved for the purposes of common schools in the limits of the reserved tracts.

Grants in aid of education from proceeds of sales of public lands.—At an early period Congress inaugurated the policy of granting a portion of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands to the several States in which they were situated. Thus in 1803 an act was passed granting 3 per cent. of such net proceeds to the State of Ohio for "laying out, opening, and making roads within the said State, and to no other purpose whatever; and an annual account of the application of the same shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury." Similar grants (in some cases of 3 and in others of 5 per cent.) have been made to the States admitted into the Union since Ohio, except to Maine, Texas, and West Virginia, in none of which did the General Government possess any public land. In some States the grants were dedicated to purposes of internal improvement, in others to education. The terms of the grant to Illinois are as follows:

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, and whenever the quarterly accounts of public moneys of the several land offices shall be settled, pay 3 per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands of the United States lying within the State of Illinois which, since the 1st day of January, 1819, have been or hereafter may be sold by the United States, after deducting all expenses incidental to the same, to such person or persons as may be authorized by the Legislature of the said State to receive the same; which sums, thus paid, shall be applied to the encouragement of learning within said State, in conformity to the provisions on this subject contained in the act entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved April 18, 1818, and to no other purpose; an annual account of the application of the same shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury by such officer of the State as the Legislature thereof shall direct; and, in default of such return being made, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required to withhold the payment of any sums that may then be due, or which may thereafter become due, until a return shall be made as herein required.

"Approved, December 12, 1820."

By the act of April 18, 1818, it was provided that one-sixth of the sums derived from the 3 per cent. of net proceeds of public land sales should "be exclusively bestowed on a college or university."

From 1821 to 1869 Illinois received under this law $713,495.45.

The whole amount paid to the several States as percentages on the net proceeds of sales of public lands was $6,508,819.11. How much of this sum has been devoted to educational purposes has not yet been ascertained; but the States named below have received the amounts named, respectively, which (either by the terms of the grant by Congress or by State constitutional enactment) are to be applied for the benefit of public education:

Illinois, from 1821 to 1869	$713,495 45
Florida, from 1847 to 1872	28,098 07
Wisconsin, from 1850 to 1875	195,423 98
Iowa, from 1849 to 1874	630,627 38
Oregon, from 1866 to 1876	25,927 60
Kansas, from 1868 to 1876	53,626 15
Nebraska, from 1869 to 1876	113,591 90
Nevada, from 1872 to 1874	3,648 81
Making a total of	1,764,439 34

Besides this, the State of Arkansas has received from the same source $224,473.15, which sum, by a provision of the State constitution adopted in 1868, was to be devoted to education, but respecting which the later constitution of 1875 is silent. Missouri has in like manner received under two acts, dated respectively March 6, 1820, and February 28, 1859, the sum of $1,008,321.86. The constitution of Missouri adopted in 1875 establishes a school fund, one of the components of which is, in the words of a clause of section 6: "Also any proceeds of the sales of public lands which may have been, or may hereafter be, paid over to this State, (if Congress will consent to such appropriation.)"

Several of the States have devoted the net proceeds of the sales of swamp and saline lands to public education, but the amounts derived from these sources have not been generally ascertained.

In Ohio the amount realized from the sale of the saline grants and added to the common school fund was reported in 1850 at $41,024; in Indiana the State school fund realized from the same source $85,000.

The constitutions of the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, (with some unimportant reservations,) and Indiana contain provisions requiring that the net proceeds of the sales of swamp lands shall be used for the benefit of public education; and in several other States, as, for example, Missouri, Ohio, and Wisconsin, the same disposition has been made under general laws, without a specific constitutional enactment.* The constitution of Alabama once contained this provision; the amendment of 1875 abrogated it. It appears from the report of the State superintendent of public instruction for 1875 that up to that date the sum of $27,340.31 had been received into the State treasury on account of sales of swamp land, but it does not appear that this amount or the income thereof had ever been used for the benefit of public education.

The amount of swamp lands granted and patented to each of the States from the date of the first grant to June 30, 1876, is as follows:

	Acres.
Ohio	25,640.71
Indiana	1,256,631.96
Illinois	1,453,611.67
Missouri	3,185,479.44
Alabama	392,719.61
Mississippi	2,681,383.16
Louisiana	8,468,964.93
Michigan	5,864,669.55
Arkansas	7,059,827.68
Florida	10,735,403.21
Wisconsin	3,059,572.62
Iowa	1,166,917.34
California	1,308,295.65
Minnesota	1,143,153 63
Total	47,802,271.16

Official reports of the amounts received from sales of these lands and of the distribution of the proceeds are not easily accessible, and it is impracticable to present at this time any statement on these heads.

Other aid to public education by the General Government.—In 1836 there was a large sum in the Treasury of the United States, largely derived from the sales of public lands, which was not needed for the current expenses of the General Government, and a law was approved on June 23 which provided for a distribution of the surplus among the twenty-five States of the Union on the basis of their respective representation in Congress. Afterward, the benefit of the act was extended to Michigan, which had just been admitted into the Union. This fund, amounting to $28,101,644.91, has since been held by the several States admitted into the Union prior to 1837, subject to call by the General Government. Several of them have devoted a part or the whole of the income realized from this fund to public education.

The State of New York received as her allotment in the distribution the sum of $4,014,520.71. The entire income of this fund, amounting to about $236,000 yearly, has been bestowed on education. By a provision in the State constitution of 1846, after adding $25,000 to the capital of the common-school fund each year, the remainder of the income is expended for the benefit of common schools and academies, apportioned as follows:

Support of common schools	$165,000
Dividend to academies	28,000
Teachers' classes in academies	18,000

The average yearly income of the common-school fund of New York exceeds 5 per cent. of the principal, so that there have been realized from that portion of the fund derived from the income of the surplus revenue fund about $600,000 in thirty-one years, and the present capital of the common-school fund is partly composed of the yearly sums set apart from the income of the revenue fund, which sums amount to $775,000. Thus it appears that from this fund of about $4,000,000 set apart by the United States for the benefit of the single State of New York that State has been able to realize for the benefit of public education the munificent sum of about $7,916,000, of which more than three-quarters of a million form a permanent capital, bearing interest.

Aid to colored schools.—The General Government, on the organization of the bureau of refugees and freedmen in 1865, began to aid schools for the education of colored children. This aid amounted, so far as can be ascertained, to $3,711,225.47. But this sum, large as it appears, does not include all, as some thousands of dollars paid out for the transportation of teachers and for other expenses connected with the schools cannot be separated from other items with which they are charged.*

Libraries, publications, and promotion of science.—The amount expended and separately reported by the General Government for libraries up to and including the year 1874, was $1,573,948.03. Besides this, large sums have been expended from time to time from general appropriations, the amount of which cannot be determined.

It is still less possible to show the much greater amounts that have been expended in conducting scientific explorations and surveys, and publishing the results, and in collecting and publishing other material covering a wide range of subjects. The amount so far as ascertained for the period above mentioned was $1,752,549.67, but this is but a small fraction compared with the aggregate.

Aid to Indian schools.—The first appropriations to aid Indian schools by the United States were made under the government of the continental congress in 1776. In 1819 a law was enacted granting $10,000 a year for the purpose of maintaining Indian schools and other agencies of civilization. This law was repealed in 1873. There was expended under its provisions while it remained in force, including an extra appropriation for the years 1856, 1857, and 1858, the sum of $561,027.15.

This amount represents but a small fraction of the whole sum expended for Indian education since the policy of making treaties with the Indian tribes was inaugurated; but these expenditures are not included here, for the reason that, with other sums paid to the Indians under treaty stipulations, they formed the consideration given for certain concessions granted by the Indians, and not a gratuity to them.

Cost of military and naval schools.—As an item of interest in this connection, the following statement of the cost of maintaining the Military Academy at West Point to June 30, 1871, and the Naval Academy at Annapolis up to June 30, 1876, is included. The amounts cover all the expenditures from the date of organization, including buildings, libraries, instruments, instruction, &c. They are as follows:

United States Military Academy, West Point	$6,801,482 73
United States Naval Academy, Annapolis	3,518,880 63

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us inquire in the next place if the distribution provided for in this bill is made in a just and proper manner. How is it made? The bill provides that for the first five years the whole fund is to be distributed; for the next five years one-half and after the expiration of ten years the whole of it is to be converted into a permanent educational fund and invested in the bonds of the United States bearing 4 per cent. interest, and the interest only to be distributed. It is provided further that for the first ten years the distribution shall be made upon the basis of illiteracy; that is according to the number of persons ten years of age and over who are unable to read and write, and after that time upon the basis of population.

We have an immense national domain—not less than 1,150,000,000 acres. But, sir, notwithstanding the immensity of that domain, it is not inexhaustible. Judging the future by the past and remembering how this public domain has been squandered in grants to monster railroad corporations, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the time may come when there will be no public domain from which to draw any revenue whatever.

Hence the committee thought it wise not to continue the expenditure from year to year in all time to come. But inasmuch as there is now a pressing necessity in many States in this Union for educational aid, we would give for the first five years the whole of this fund, and for the next five years one-half, and after the expiration of ten years the interest only of the fund.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GOODE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I have not seen the bill and was not present when it was read. I understand the gentleman states it is to be distributed in proportion to illiteracy.

Mr. GOODE. For the first ten years.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that would give a larger amount to the South perhaps than to the North or to the Northeast, and the reason it would is because the colored people are as a general thing illiterate. Now are there provisions in this bill by which the white people of the South, if they should perhaps be unwilling, shall be compelled to give the black people their proportion of the money for the education of the black people?

Mr. GOODE. There is no provision compelling it; but let me assure the gentleman from Maine, and I know he is usually fair, that there is no disposition in any Southern State to discriminate in any way whatever between the white and colored children in regard to education. None, sir; but on the contrary the State constitutions, so far as I know, expressly provide there shall be no such discrimination.

One other word. Let me say to the gentleman this bill has been maturely considered. We have had the benefit of the labors of the National Educational Association. We have had in conference with the committee men of learning, college professors interested in this question, and on full consultation the committee were of opinion it would be unwise and unsafe to interfere in any manner whatever with the exclusive control of the State governments over their own local systems of education.

Mr. MONROE. Will the gentleman yield for a minute to me?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONROE. I wish to say in reply to my friend from Maine that I think the gentleman from Virginia, in his reply, has not done full justice to this bill. As the gentleman from Maine will see on reading it, there is a provision copied from like bills introduced in this House in former Congresses, for which he as well as I voted, that before any of this fund shall be paid over by the General Government to any State that State shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of a law by a previous Legislature whereby the State accepted the grant of money on condition of establishing free schools for all the children of the State of school age. Without a just and impartial law like this no State can obtain its share of the money.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will allow me to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GOODE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask him, he having examined the bill as a member of the committee, whether or not he is satisfied with the provision of which he speaks? If he is, then it satisfies me.

Mr. MONROE. I will say, Mr. Chairman, I understood the provision covered the ground which the gentleman from Maine states, and I the more readily so understood it because it was copied from former bills for which Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts, and myself had voted, believing it to be sufficient. But if it is not sufficient I want to make it so. That is all.

Mr. GOODE. And so do we. But I will state to the gentleman from Maine that while there was a strong sentiment in the committee that it would be unsafe and unwise on the part of Congress to undertake to control the educational systems of the States; or, in other words, the great interest of education would be better and more efficiently cared for by leaving it to the local and municipal power of each State; yet the committee recognized the fact that in making the grant the Congress of the United States had power to prescribe its conditions. If the gentleman will refer to the tenth and eleventh lines of section 4, on page 3, he will find it is provided this fund when distributed shall be faithfully applied to the free education of all the children, and each State is required to file with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the law accepting the provisions of this act and stipulating the fund so provided shall be faithfully applied and distributed in the manner herein required.

And furthermore, we provide if any State shall violate the provisions of this law, shall misapply this fund, or shall allow it to be misapplied or misappropriated in any way, it shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment until the amount so misapplied shall be replaced.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. GOODE. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman have any objection to have inserted at the proper place the words "without distinction of race or color?"

Mr. GOODE. I have no objection to that unless the gentleman means to provide for mixed schools. I am unalterably opposed to them, but I am willing to make it as plain as language possibly can that this fund is intended to be dedicated to the free education of all the children, white and colored; and if the gentleman is not satisfied he may say both white and colored. But I repeat, I would oppose any proposition coming from any quarter to establish mixed schools in any part of this country, because I believe it would be ruinous alike to the colored and to the white, and so far as my information goes the most intelligent colored people are opposed to mixed schools.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not understand this bill is intended to regulate the school system of any of the States, and I agree with the gentleman so far as that is concerned.

Mr. GOODE. We have expressly provided against that. I wish to refer to one other statement made by the gentleman from Maine. He said it might possibly be that on the basis of illiteracy some of the Southern States might get an apparent advantage under the provisions of this bill. I beg the gentlemen of this House to remember that those States have been completely ruined and impoverished by the results of the late war, and that immense loads of public debt have been heaped upon them since. If the gentleman will examine the statistical tables on this subject which I propose to incorporate in my remarks he will see the unfortunate condition in which eleven of the Southern States were left by the results of the war; that from 1860 to 1870 they lost more than half their wealth; that during those ten years their losses amounted to about three billions; that during that decade the people of the North had their individual wealth doubled, while pecuniary ruin has been visited upon the people of the South. That notwithstanding their immense losses they have bravely undertaken the work of educating all their children of school age, without regard to race, color, or previous condition. But how is it possible for them to accomplish the herculean task without help? And why should not the Government extend to them the aid contemplated by the provisions of this bill?

Mr. FRYE. I ask the gentleman to allow me one moment, as I do not wish to be misrepresented. I know the gentleman does not mean to misrepresent me. I do not wish to be understood at all as reflecting in the slightest degree upon the South by the statement that there might be more illiteracy there. I explained it in the words which followed. I certainly desire this money to go, if it goes anywhere, where it is most needed. I did not mean to cast the slightest reflection on the South.

Mr. GOODE. I am glad I misunderstood the gentleman, and I re-echo the sentiment he has just uttered; the money, if it goes anywhere, should go where it will do the most good. I know the gentleman from Maine, and every intelligent gentleman on this floor will respond to the sentiment that when the curse of ignorance afflicts any part of the body-politic it exerts a deleterious influence upon the whole. I believe the interest of the Southern States in this respect to be the interest of all the States.

Permit me, in this connection, to introduce the tables to which I have already referred, which have been prepared by Dr. William H. Ruffner, superintendent of public instruction in Virginia:

TABLE I.—Showing population of Northern and Southern States.

Population.	White.	Colored.	Total.

School population in Northern States	8,673,643	127,751	8,837,394

Per cent. of illiterates from 10–21 to population of same age.

In Southern States (including Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and West Virginia)	44.08
In Northern States (including Western)	6.11

Per cent. of illiterate males, 21 and over, to male population of same age.

In the fifteen Southern States	33.19
In the twenty-two Northern States	7.43

And the painful fact must be stated that even among the whites, in the eleven Southern States proper, the percentage of illiteracy increased from 7.1 in 1860 to 9.8 in 1870—owing no doubt to the war.

THE COST OF THE EDUCATIONAL WORK NEEDED.

Twenty-four per cent. of the whole population of the Northern States proper are enrolled in their public schools. To educate 24 per cent. of the population of the Southern States, for eight months in the year, at the rate of seventy-five cents per month for the tuition of each scholar enrolled, would cost annually as follows:

NOTE.—The counties now composing West Virginia were excluded from the calculation for 1860. Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri are omitted because of the almost equally divided interests of the people during the decade under consideration.

To whom do the public lands belong and how have they been acquired? They belong in common to all the people. They have been acquired partly by cession, partly by purchase, and partly by conquest. The Government holds them in trust for the common use and benefit of all the people of all the States. But how has that responsible trust been administered? Has equal and exact justice been done to all the States of the Union? Have the older States, which made such liberal cessions for the common good and to sustain the waning credit of the Government in the beginning, received their just and fair proportion of this common fund? Nearly one hundred million of acres of the public lands have been donated to the new States and Territories for educational purposes, and more than two hundred millions of acres have been donated to monster railroad corporations existing within the limits of the same States. I submit the time has now arrived when something should be done by Congress to correct this great inequality and injustice. The great need of the South to-day is educational aid. Her people are doing all in their power to educate the rising generation, but they are too much impoverished to accomplish the work single-handed and alone. One of the results of the war was the emancipation of about four million of colored people. Was it right for the Government to enfranchise them, make them citizens and voters, without some adequate provision to qualify them for the proper discharge of the responsible duties incident to the new station to which they were suddenly elevated? Can the Government bestow civil and political rights upon these "wards of the nation" and at the same time avoid the solemn obligation to provide for their mental and moral improvement? This duty has been strongly urged by many prominent Northern gentlemen upon this floor during the last few years. The same recommendation has been made by the National Educational Association; and Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, in a speech delivered in New York before the American Missionary Association, enforced this obligation in the following emphatic terms:

> We have done much for the freedmen of the South, but we have not done one tithe of what we should have done. * * * The work of educating, and thereby elevating, the poor freedmen of the South is imperative. It must be done. We may labor for this from motives of benevolence or not, but we must do the work. Suppose we allow the element of selfishness to influence our action? The peace and order of the nation demand that every man shall be educated.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the manner of this distribution among the several States and Territories. It is proposed to make it for the first ten years upon the basis of illiteracy, because in that way the greatest good will be accomplished and the most urgent need will be supplied. I am sure that neither the wealthy Northern States of the old thirteen, nor the new States which have been favored with such magnificent endowments, will interpose an objection.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call special attention to the fact that we do not propose by this bill to disturb in any degree the exclusive control of the State governments over their own local systems of education. Accordingly, this bill proposes to donate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands directly and at once to the States, upon the single condition that they will hold the fund and administer it as a sacred trust in the interests of education. This is a reasonable and proper condition, which Congress in making the grant may rightfully impose. I have no doubt the State governments would gladly accept the donation upon this condition, and that the trust devolved upon them would be faithfully and honestly administered.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is intended to limit the powers of the Government to the disposition of the lands for the purposes mentioned in the two provisos alone.

Mr. GOODE. None whatever. We intend to leave the power of Congress over the public domain entirely unlimited. All we mean to say is that the net cash proceeds shall be dedicated to this purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it understood by the committee that under those provisos the Government would have the power to appropriate the public lands to aid public improvements?

Mr. GOODE. Unquestionably, for any purpose. We only take the money received from the sales of public lands and apply it to this purpose.

Mr. BUCKNER. What is the amount thus received from those sales?

Mr. GOODE. It has varied for several years past, and for the last decade the net receipts have been about $1,500,000. Some years it amounted to $3,000,000, some years to $2,000,000, but my information is that for the last decade the total receipts have averaged about $1,500,000 per year.

Mr. BUCKNER. The net proceeds?

Mr. GOODE. Yes; the net proceeds.

Now, ought not this bill to pass? I will not detain the committee much longer. I have shown that we have the constitutional power to do it. I have shown that the manner of distribution proposed is fair and just.

Now, the only question for gentlemen to consider is this: Is the object contemplated by the provisions of this bill a wise, humane, and beneficent one? In my humble judgment the proceeds of the sale of the public lands could not possibly be dedicated to any higher, nobler, or more beneficent purpose than for the free education of all the children.

Look at the census. I beg gentlemen upon this floor to look at the census of 1870, and see the appalling amount of ignorance in this country which is disclosed by it.

One-fifth of our population, or six millions of our people over ten years of age, are not able to read and write. Twelve millions of children, between the ages of five and eighteen, are growing up in ignorance and without any educational advantages whatever, and of the eight millions of the voters of this country who march up to the ballot-box from time to time and control our destinies politically and socially sixteen hundred thousand are unable to read what is printed upon the ballot which they cast into the ballot-box.

Sir, I will not insult the intelligence of this honorable body by enlarging upon the benefits of universal popular education. It is my deliberate judgment that upon it depends not only the prosperity but the perpetuity of the Republic.

I adopt the sentiment of that great German "reformer" Martin Luther, when he said that the prosperity of a State does not consist in its treasures, its strong walls, its beautiful mansions, and its brilliant decorations. The wealth of a State, its safety, and its force consist in an abundance of citizens who are honest, instructed, and educated. Ignorance is a more dangerous foe to any people than an army with banners.

Sir, I might occupy the time of the committee further upon this question, but there are other gentlemen who wish to speak.

We want a vote upon this question to-day if possible, and I hope that after the two hours' discussion shall have been had the members of the committee will remain and vote, because after to-day it is no longer a special order.

For the present I yield a portion of the time allotted to me to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BELL.]

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration forever consecrates and sets apart the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands for the education of the people. It does not change, nor affect in any way whatever, any law now in force authorizing the preemption of public lands, nor the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor does it interfere in any manner with the power of Congress over the public domain. It provides, after paying the expenses of sale, that the whole of the net proceeds shall be distributed among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population, between the ages of five and twenty-one years. For the first five years the whole of said proceeds, and for the next five years one-half, to be apportioned to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia according to the numbers of their respective population of ten years old and upward who cannot read and write, as shown from time to time by the last preceding published census of the United States. It further provides that one-fourth of the money appropriated by this act shall be given to the colleges known as agricultural colleges, established or hereafter to be established in accordance with the act approved July 2, 1862, unless in any case the Legislature of a State or Territory shall otherwise direct.

In a word, it gives three-fourths of the amount to the cause of popular education and one-fourth, subject to the control of the State and territorial Legislatures, to the aid of agricultural education. It provides that after ten years the whole amount shall be invested in bonds of the United States bearing a rate of interest at 4 per cent. per annum, principal and interest payable in coin. The interest thereon to be applied to free education in conformity with the provisions of the bill.

This bill contains ample provisions to secure the application of the fund to the object intended and appropriate penalties for its misapplication.

I apprehend that no great difference of opinion exists and that no controversy will arise upon the details of this measure. Nor can any question of constitutional power arise.

The second clause of section 3, article 4, of the Constitution declares that "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

This provision grants plenary power to Congress to dispose of the public domain. No one will hazard his reputation for intelligence by denying that the power to dispose of the territory necessarily includes the power to dispose of the proceeds of the territory. The ownership of the territory necessarily involves the right and power, in the absence of any constitutional qualifications or limitations, to dispose of it and its proceeds.

But the question upon which a difference of opinion may exist is whether the disposition proposed by this measure is wise. And to the consideration of this great question the attention of the country is invited, and upon it the favorable action of Congress invoked. It has passed into a maxim that the preservation and perpetuity of our institutions depend upon the virtue and intelligence of the people. The question of man's capacity for self-government is still an unsolved problem. Every effort hitherto made has resulted in failure. We are now making the world's last experiment under conditions more favorable to success than any that history records. The recognition of power, of sovereign political power in the people, is the distinguishing attribute, the very genius of our system. The rights, duties, and powers of executive, legislative, judicial, and ministerial officers are all defined, prescribed, and limited by law. The untrammeled ballot—the sole peaceful instrument of original, inherent, political power—is the power behind the throne that is greater than the throne. Every ballot is a vital factor in determining the destiny of millions. It therefore follows that upon the intelligent and wise exercise of this power all the great moral, social, and civil interests of society in this country depend. This question is not ephemeral in its nature, sectional in its character, nor local in its influence. It is as wide in its range as the wants of humanity, enduring as the quenchless fires of intellect, and deals with the destiny of races. There is no question of public expenditure, except the expenses of administering the government and payment of the public debt, so purely national in its object as this.

All expenditures for railways and canals, the improvement of rivers and harbors, the erection of public buildings, &c., contain local as well as national elements, and not unfrequently engender local and sectional prejudices and animosities. But every State, every section, and every individual in the Republic is deeply interested in the qualifications of every citizen to discharge the obligations and meet the high responsibilities of American citizenship.

The public domain was acquired by the common blood and the common treasure of the people, and it seems to me that there is a peculiar fitness in devoting it to their education. Then the basis of distribution is one of perfect equality—illiteracy for ten years and population thereafter. It may be urged that the basis of illiteracy is unequal because it gives the larger portion of this fund to the South for ten years. It is true that the South would get the larger portion for that period, but it does not follow that the distribution is unequal for that reason. Equality and justice consist in meeting the necessities of the case. The education of the illiterate is the object, and this distribution recognizes the right of every illiterate child to an equal participation in this benefaction. But this issue of inequality or injustice is an unfortunate one for the opponents of this bill to raise. While Georgia and Virginia, receiving only an equal amount per capita for their illiterate with all the other States, would receive in the aggregate more than any of the others, it may be interesting to inquire what contributions to the national Treasury these two States have made by the cession of their territory, and how they compare with the contributions of the other States, and also what States have been the beneficiaries of the Federal Government in the way of internal improvements and public works.

From 1789 to 1873 the Federal Government expended in public works, railroads, canals, and wagon-roads the sum of $207,999,664.77. Of this $18,594,049.46 was expended in the sixteen Southern and border States, $174,885,371.21 in the Northern and Western States and Territories, and $15,520,224 in the District of Columbia. Of the aggregate sum of $207,999,664.77, $103,294,501.35 were appropriated in bonds and money to public works from 1865 to 1873; the remaining $104,705,163.43 to railroads, wagon-roads, and canals from 1789 to 1873. Of this sum neither Georgia, Texas, nor West Virginia received one dollar. Virginia, North Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri received $5,480,172.94, while the other States and Territories received $99,224,990.49.

Georgia ceded to the Federal Government the territory now constituting the States of Alabama and Mississippi with the express stipulation in the deed of cession that "it should be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included." The Government realized from this magnificent domain $40,000,000 in cash, while in the distribution of $104,705,163.43 for works of internal improvement among the other States Georgia did not receive one cent. Besides, the United States this day owe her $36,000 for money she expended for the common defense in the Revolutionary war. The State of Virginia ceded to the Government the territory comprising the greater part of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, containing an area of 137,860 square miles, property worth $10,329,669,974, while she has received of the $104,705,163.43 only $57,538.27. The Government had received up to 1850 from the sale of public lands ceded by Virginia $80,000,000.

This grand old Commonwealth, after having given away an empire, stands "like royalty in ruins," struggling with misfortune, poverty, and debt, with elevated crest and unbroken spirit. She urns in her heart the ashes of her heroes and statesmen; the lofty device of sic semper tyrannis still emblazons her shield. Wrapped in the imperial robes of her ancient sovereignty, she stands not at your door a mendicant asking alms, but the mother of States and of statesmen, demanding for her illiterate children an equal participation in the treasure her bounty bestowed.

Georgia shelters her two hundred and seventy-five thousand illiterate under her arch supported by wisdom, justice, and moderation, and in the calmness of conscious dignity points to the magnificent domain of Alabama and Mississippi and the forty millions the Government received from the gift as the evidence of her right to an equal share of this treasure. In the presence of these facts avarice itself must stand abashed, and no whisper of inequality or injustice be heard or breathed.

The last census discloses the humiliating fact that there are nearly six millions of children in the United States over ten years of age who can neither read nor write. Every chapter of our legislative history recognizes the constitutional power of Congress to aid the education of the people. Many laws have been passed and a vast amount of the public lands donated for this purpose. Individual effort and parental affection and solicitude have contributed much toward the intellectual development and cultivation of the people of this country. The different religious sects throughout the country, stimulated by a legitimate denominational pride, animated by a generous emulation and inspired by the loftier sentiment of Christian philanthropy, have employed all their energies and exhausted all their resources to promote the cause of education and advance the standard of a Christian civilization. Eight hundred and thirty-four thousand four hundred and eleven noble men and women, worthy to wear "the red wreath by martyrs won," instruct weekly in Sunday schools over six millions of children. States have endowed and maintained colleges and universities.

Every section and every State bristles with the spires of colleges, male and female. I believe every State in the Union now has established by organic law a system of free public schools supported by taxation; still the deplorable fact meets us everywhere, and at all times, that there are six millions unblessed by any and all of these agencies, with the light of learning, who are starving at a banquet and famishing at a fountain. And yet these children are soon in part to bear the ark that contains the oracles of popular liberty and the covenant of free institutions. The education of the masses in this country, at least in the rudimentary principles of learning, is demanded by every consideration that patriotism, philanthropy, and religion can urge. Neither denominational church enterprise nor private effort, much as they have done, can accomplish this most desirable object. Experience has shown that some system established by law, harmonious in its machinery, universal in its operation, and perpetual in its duration, is required. Experience has also demonstrated that the establishment and maintenance of such a system is an undertaking of the greatest difficulty, involving the utmost exercise of patience, the largest share of liberality, and the highest order of statesmanship; for the reason that its establishment and successful operation depend upon so many conditions rarely found to exist in combination.

The people of the Southern States are engaged in a heroic struggle with these difficulties, which are numerous and formidable. The system encountered at the threshold the opposition of enemies, the fears of the timid, the doubts of the faithless, the apprehension of friends, and the poverty of all. Every step taken discovered some new obstacle in the way of success. There are but comparatively few large towns and cities in the South; the greater part of that section of the Union is rural, the people are engaged in agricultural pursuits, the population in the country is sparse, and great difficulty was found in the location of school-houses so as to accommodate the largest number and equally distribute the benefits of instruction. But the greatest difficulty with which they had to contend, and which it is the object of this bill to obviate, to some extent at least, was the want of means. All will readily recognize money as an indispensable element of success; and that we do not possess. The losses resulting directly and indirectly from the war, the overwhelming burden of debt, public and private, with which the people are crushed, and the enormous taxation necessarily imposed upon them, make it doubtful whether the system of free public schools in the Southern States, so courageously inaugurated, will not have to be abandoned in despair or left to languish and ultimately perish for want of support unless timely aid come from some quarter. Those who have not taken the trouble to examine into the extent of these losses have but little conception of their magnitude. Take, for illustration, the State of Georgia:

The taxable property in Georgia was valued under oath by the tax-payers in 1860 at	$672,322,777
In 1868 it was valued at	191,235,520
A loss of	481,087,257

This includes 450,000 slaves, valued at $302,694,833. The losses, aside from the slaves, amounted to $188,392,424, an amount nearly equal to the whole taxable property in 1868. It will be borne in mind that this property was valued at a time when cotton brought a high price, when the volume of the currency was large, before the contraction policy of Secretary McCulloch was inaugurated and before the war values had shrunk to a normal condition. If we add to these losses the duplication of the public debt, the consequent increase of taxation, the subversion of our labor system, and the revolution in our modes, habits, industries, and economies, not only of a life-time but of time immemorial, some just judgment can be formed of our poverty and condition to commence and prosecute an expensive system of popular education. And yet Georgia probably suffered less than most of the Southern States. I have purposely refrained from any allusion to the crucifixion of reconstruction through which we passed. I have no fancy for rekindling the fires of hate and passion that deluged a continent in blood, nor have I any respect for the man who ignores the vital issues of the living present and coming future to indulge in crimination and recrimination for the low purposes of party or for any other purpose.

Under these circumstances of discouragement and difficulty we have inaugurated this system of public education, and are now struggling to maintain it and make it a success. It has in every Southern State the sanction of organic law. The provision upon this subject in the constitution of Georgia is as follows:

> There shall be a thorough system of common schools for the education of children in the elementary branches of an English education only, as nearly uniform as practicable, the expenses of which shall be provided for by taxation or otherwise. The school shall be free to all children of the State, but separate schools shall be provided for the white and colored races. Authority may be granted to counties upon the recommendation of two grand juries, and to municipal corporations upon the recommendation of the corporate authority, to establish and maintain public schools in their respective limits by local taxation; but no such local law shall take effect until the same shall have been submitted to a vote of the qualified voters in each county or municipal corporation and approved by a two-third vote of persons qualified to vote at such election, and the General Assembly may prescribe who shall vote on such questions.

Emancipation has immensely swelled the number to be educated, and therefore increased the demand for means. This increase in number occurred precisely at the time when the means were most diminished. The additional number brings no material aid, except perhaps the single item of poll tax levied upon the colored people. Under the educational system of every Southern State the colored people are entitled to an equal participation with the whites in the school fund. There is no distinction, except that the white and colored schools are separate.

Whatever differences of opinion may have existed, or whatever theories may have been advanced or speculations indulged respecting the capabilities of the negro race for intellectual development and distinction, with proper facilities for culture, it is clear that the truth can be ascertained by the test of trial. This experiment the white people of the South have determined, if possible, shall be made. In making it they discharge an obligation while they dispense a benefaction. The history of the negro race is a sad one. It has been the sportive plaything of capricious fortune. Its destiny has been wrought by agencies over which it had no control. Hugging for countless ages the torrid zone, the influences of habit and climate developed the animal nature and emasculated the intellectual and moral powers, leaving barbarism as the result. The contact of the negro with the white race has hitherto been, in the main, under conditions that confined the means of their advancement to imitation and observation. Neither history nor tradition brings from them any contribution to civilization in the achievement of arms, the discoveries of science, or the inventions of art. I have said that the white people of the South are but discharging an obligation to the negroes in their effort to educate their children. They served us before emancipation, they were faithful to us in the dark days of the war, and they have, under the circumstances and temptations surrounding them, demeaned themselves well since the surrender.

What were the circumstances surrounding them? They were suddenly transformed from slaves to freedmen; they did not and perhaps never will know who was responsible for their enslavement. They would naturally hold their former masters responsible and regard the agents of the Federal Government as their deliverers; and thus the avenues to their confidence and credulity were opened. The Freedman's Bank was established to be plundered by knaves, and the Freedman's Bureau organized to control their political affiliations under the pretext of managing their affairs. Artful villains appealed to their communistic instincts by false promises of an agrarian division of property. Infamous adventurers swore them to deadly hostility to the whites in secret conclaves in the darkness of midnight, and aroused their superstition by administering the oath over skeletons and coffins. Newly clothed with the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizenship, they were marched and countermarched on election days to the stirring music of drum and fife around the polls in the presence of disfranchised patriotism and ostracised virtue and intelligence. They were elevated from prison cells to legislative halls, and converted from sweating convicts into pompous legislators, exchanging the humbler occupation of bearing burdens for the loftier business of making constitutions. And at last Federal legislation undertook to bridge the social gulf separating the races, established by nature and extending "down to earth profound and up to heaven," and invite them over to perfect social equality with the superior race.

Yet with all these powerful influences pressed upon them, let it be said to the infinite credit of the great mass of the colored people that they have conducted themselves with a propriety and exhibited a capacity for usefulness in society that has more than met the expectations of their most judicious friends. If occasional riots have attended or preceded elections, they have been instigated and manipulated outside of the South, or by the agents of parties outside, to inflame and control public opinion pending closely contested elections in other States, with the view of controlling important elections. And thus the colored people have been made the unwitting instruments of occasional disorders which have their conception in foul conspiracies outside of the South, and for which the white people of the South are falsely held responsible. The relations of friendship existing between the races in the South are not at all surprising; it is but the legitimate effect of obvious causes and results from traditional family attachments not in any wise incompatible with superior and subordinate relations. The races are identified in interest and in neighborhood. The dealings of the white race with the black have been characterized by the strictest justice, fairness, and honesty; the colored people have received from them sympathy in their sorrow, assistance in their misfortunes, and encouragement in their struggles; all of their political rights have been conceded with cheerfulness and enforced with fidelity; an upright and learned bench always assigns for the defense of the accused who are unable to employ counsel the ablest lawyers the bar supplies; and now, in almost hopeless poverty, the white people are paying heavy self-imposed taxes to test the experiment of their education.

If the colored people are the "wards of the nation," if the Federal Government is the guardian of these people, this bill and this occasion furnish the finest opportunity it will ever have to discharge the most important duty of the guardianship—the education of the wards. They stand here by the millions through their representatives and insist that the Government will at least aid their late owners in this humane effort to improve their condition; and this appeal they emphasize with the pathos of helplessness, of poverty. How far their general education, if it can be accomplished, would affect their inclination to manual labor and impair their capacity for its performance, is a question that may well excite serious apprehension. Living as they do in a purely agricultural section, and adapted as their labor is to the climate and productions of that section, their manual labor is not only indispensable to their own support, but of the first importance to the prosperity of the whole country. But the consideration of this question is foreclosed by the general judgment of the country that the experiment shall be made. The practical question now is, how to secure the means to make it. Since the organization of the Government, Congress has donated to the cause of education, under different acts, land amounting in the aggregate to 95,737,714 acres, and the sum of $47,785,197.93 in money. The greater portion of the land was given to the Northwestern States by setting apart for educational purposes, in that section, sections 16 and 36. Upon her annexation to the Union the State of Texas reserved her public lands, and has therefore ample resources for the support of her educational system. But she stands the solitary exception among the Southern States, who have received only a trifling sum compared with the amount received by other States, Virginia and Georgia less than almost any of them, although each ceded to the General Government an empire in extent and wealth, and now in the extremity of their poverty, when the number of their illiterate population has been doubled, they invoke the aid which this bill proposes to extend. They do so in common with the other Southern States, not only to educate the white children within their borders, but to educate the ignorant colored race in which one-eighth of the sovereign political power of the Republic is vested by the Constitution and laws of the United States. Thirty-five Representatives of the American people on this floor symbolize the power of the negro race, two-fifths of which—fourteen in number—accrued from emancipation; to say nothing of the improvement of their intelligence, their morals, and their elevation in the scale of civilization. Does not the qualification for citizenship, which education alone supplies, demand imperatively that speedy and ample provision be made for that education?

Are not the institutions of this country imperiled by the ignorance of so large a number with whom political power is deposited, whose votes, from ignorance, are liable to be controlled by prejudice or purchase? Is not the Government under some obligation to furnish the means to qualify these people for the enjoyment of the right and the exercise of the power which is so unceremoniously and so bountifully thrust upon them? This bill provides that one-fourth of the money appropriated by it shall be given to the agricultural colleges unless the Legislatures of the States and Territories shall otherwise direct; thus devoting one-fourth of the sum to agricultural education. The judgment of Congress and the country has been made up upon the wisdom and propriety of fostering intelligence in the cultivation of the soil of this country. That judgment is recorded in the act establishing these colleges and appropriating a part of the public land to support them, and in the acts of the various Legislatures accepting the donation. The success of these institutions vindicates their claim to liberal support.

I but state what all know to be true when I assert that the agricultural is the paramount interest of this country, the basis of all prosperity, and the only original source from which subsistence and clothing come. There can be no reason why its votaries should not be as well educated as those of any other art or science, and there can exist no reason why cultivated intellect should not be employed in the discovery and the development of the resources of the soil. The North Georgia Agricultural College, established by the act of 1862, has accomplished more good in the few years of its existence than any two schools in the State within the same period: unfortunately its buildings were recently destroyed by fire.

To the products of the soil are we mainly indebted for the balance of trade in our favor, amounting for the last year to $309,309,741. It is the labor employed in agriculture and the products of that labor that enable us to dispute commercial supremacy with Great Britain. This labor is productive in the proportion that it is guided by intelligence.

If experience should show that one-fourth of this money could be more usefully employed in other departments of education, then it is perfectly competent for the Legislatures of the States and Territories so to employ it. It is within the control and subject to the direction of the State and territorial authorities. There can therefore, as it seems to me, be no well-founded objection to the bill because it gives a part of the money to this particular class of institutions. While this is truly a national question, still, regarding it from a local and sectional stand-point; in view of the necessities for aid to public education in the South, it is important to inquire what amount this measure will supply. Assuming, as estimated by the Commissioner of Education, that the sales will amount annually to $1,500,000, the amount that each of the Southern States would receive is exhibited in the following table:

Alabama	$101,534 56
Arkansas	35,347 50
Florida	19,034 61
Georgia	124,221 66
Kentucky	88,058 19
Louisiana	73,208 10
Mississippi	83,056 90
Missouri	58,960 03
North Carolina	105,425 63
South Carolina	76,978 02
Tennessee	96,679 35
Texas	58,772 35
Virginia	118,203 99
West Virginia	21,602 58
	1,061,083 47

It will be seen that the State of Georgia would annually receive upon this basis $124,221.66, one-fourth of which, or $31,055.41, for five years would amount to $155,277. This would endow the agricultural college, leaving to the cause of popular education in this State each year $93,166.25, which amount would vary of course with the amount of the sales of the public land. We can form some estimate of the aid which this bill will render to the education of the people of the United States when it is remembered that the public domain, surveyed and unsurveyed, amounts to 1,154,471,762 acres. Whether this domain shall be wisely and humanely devoted to the education and elevation of the masses of the people of this country, distributed upon the basis of necessity and equality, or given to rich and powerful corporations, and thus increase their means of fixing the price of labor and controlling legislation, is not a debatable question.

Mr. Chairman, the first century of our national existence vindicates the wisdom that founded our institutions and the beneficence that distinguishes their operation. Our career is the wonder and admiration of the world. We have extended our domain from a narrow strip along the Atlantic coast across a hundred degrees of longitude to the Pacific Ocean, increased the number of States from thirteen to thirty-eight and our population from three millions to fifty millions. We have a country that possesses every variety of climate and production, soil and scenery. It combines in prodigal profusion every element of individual and national wealth. It opens an inviting field to every industrial enterprise and bestows the richest rewards upon the efforts of labor. It has given to immortality the names of Franklin, Fulton, and Morse, and bequeathed to mankind the triumphs of their genius. Its discoveries in science and inventions in art have revolutionized the industries and commerce of the world. Her iron ships float upon every sea and bear to every port the treasures of her mines, her fields, and her forests.

Our skill has unlocked the arcana of nature and utilized her physical forces in constructing the temple of freedom, and American genius has brought its trophies of sculpture, painting, and poetry to adorn its columns and festoon its arches. American orators have eclipsed the famous masters of antiquity. American literature has attained a range of thought, a felicity of expression, and a purity of sentiment unknown to other ages and countries. We have sent back to the birthplace of civilization the inspiration of a new national life and aroused the east from the slumber of ages. Hoary systems are dissolving in the blaze of the star of empire that "westward takes it way." Vitalized by contact with us, China and Japan have adopted systems of popular education abreast with the demands of the age that rival the best models of modern times. But while we are dazzled with the splendor of these achievements that cultivated intellect has done so much to secure, we are confronted with the melancholy fact that six millions of American children are unable to read and write the language in which the historian records and perpetuates them.

If so much has been accomplished in the brief period of a century under existing disadvantages, what hopes are the least sanguine not authorized to indulge of the future grandeur and glory of our common country? Each conquest in this aggressive march to national destiny enlarges the desire and augments the power for new and grander results, and each new acquisition imposes additional obligations.

Next in importance to the obligation to preserve public liberty is the duty of providing the means for popular education. These will be the two great agents of advancement in the future, as they have been of success in the past. The possibilities of our future promise more than the realization of Utopian dreams. They spread out over the vast West a population numbered by hundreds of millions, combining the strength of the Roman with the culture of the Greek, uniting the chivalry of Bayard with the benevolence of Howard, and exhibiting in blended harmony the best elements of the puritan and the cavalier; a wilderness reclaimed from primeval solitude, yielding to industry harvests that fill the marts of the world with commerce and appease the hunger of nations with bread; great national highways substituting the dim trail of the receding Indian, magnificent cities occupying the place of abandoned wigwams, and the light of council-fires paling before the superior light reflected from galleries of art, halls of learning, and temples of worship, realizing the fulfillment of prophetic prediction:

> The wilderness shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.

This population under the protection of and this progress fostered by a Government under a written constitution, that explicitly defines the powers of the Government and expressly secures the rights of the people, we may here expect to witness the highest physical, social, moral, and political development of which the race is capable.

It was during the thousand years of darkness and blood, when cloistered monks monopolized the learning of Europe and Asia, leaving the masses in ignorance, that barbarous conquerors and ambitious prelates fastened upon the world the despotism of the feudal system and the horrors of the inquisition. Against this stupendous crime upon humanity its mind, heart, and conscience have never ceased to utter their protest. The revival of letters and the general diffusion of knowledge relaxed the grasp of the tyrant and broke the spell of tyranny; and cultivated intellect, inspired by patriotism, at the expense of blood has erected and consecrated upon American soil the sacred temple of liberty, rebuilt her ruined altars, installed her banished priestess, and restored the worship of her divinity. And here, under the patronage of republican institutions and universal education, liberty finds its freest expression, religion its purest model, and humanity its highest type.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and asked a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WITHERS conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 5655) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1878.

PUBLIC LANDS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES.

The Committee of the Whole then resumed its session.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ought to have known that this bill had been assigned for this day, but I confess that I did not know the fact, and hence I am not prepared to express the opposition which I have to the bill as clearly and as fully as I otherwise might have done.

No one can feel a deeper interest in the question of free public education than I do myself. My experiences in connection with public schools in the past have given me a very deep interest in free education; and yet, sir, I have been one who has always believed that the common-school education of a State should be the creature of the State, should be fostered by the State, and that it is not the province of the General Government to foster or build up a system of public education in any State.

I remember, in the Forty-second Congress, a very elaborate, able, and convincing speech made by Mr. Kerr, of Indiana, afterward Speaker of the House. I sympathized with the arguments in that speech, because I believed that the system of public education in a State should be built up by the State itself, should be fostered by the State, and there should be a public sentiment in the State in harmony with a system of free education, otherwise the General Government may give and give, and yet there will be no healthy and vigorous school system in the State.

If the State of Virginia, for instance, at any time desires to have a public-school system as good as that of the State of Michigan, there must be in Virginia the same public sentiment that there is in the State of Michigan. They must as freely vote money in the one State as in the other; they must provide as liberally for the supervision of the schools in the one State as in the other; they must do as much for the cause of public education in the one State as in the other, else there will be no good system of public education in that State.

Now, sir, the friends of this bill very greatly overestimate the amounts that would come to the several States if it should become a law. The amount that would come to a State would be but a mere pittance. I intend to show that before the first five years have elapsed, during which time it is possible for the States to spend all the money to be derived under this bill, there would be substantially no money coming into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands.

I insist that we have reached almost the outer limit in the sales of public lands and in the receipt of revenue from the sales of public lands. While receipts were quite large last year, I shall be able from statistics to show that the receipts from the pre-emption law have been and are gradually and rapidly lessening; and that at the end of the five years there would be nothing left to go into this fund, and the amount distributed from year to year during those five years would be so very small that the States would get no benefit at all from this pretended or intended benevolence.

I am opposed to this bill because it will interfere with a free, untrammeled system of legislation in regard to the public lands. If this bill shall become a law it will be absolutely impossible to secure an amendment of the land laws of the United States such as I insist the interests of the country to-day call for. I allude now to the pre-emption laws.

For the last six or eight years the Commissioner of the General Land Office has repeated the recommendation of that department that the pre-emption laws of the United States should be repealed, and that the remaining arable agricultural lands of the United States should be open only and solely to homestead settlers. There is a bill now pending that provides that all acts and parts of acts relative to the pre-emption laws of the United States shall be repealed, and that henceforth and hereafter all the agricultural lands of the United States shall be open only to entry under the homestead and tree-culture acts.

Now, if we could get at the real statistics—and I certainly would have had them here if I had known beforehand of this discussion to-day—you would find that not one-twentieth part of the remaining public lands of the United States are agricultural lands; not one, twentieth part. And I desire to show that at the present time not simply in the West, but in the East and throughout the country there is a large demand for the unoccupied and unentered agricultural lands of the United States.

I insist that we shall interfere with what is a grandly hopeful outlook at the present time, if we enact this bill into a law. We shall interfere with legislation that would open up this agricultural domain to actual settlement. I wish to show from statistics (a single page of which has been brought to my attention since this debate commenced) the entries of the last year.

Mr. DWIGHT. From what is the gentleman now reading?

Mr. DUNNELL. From the Land Office Report of 1878. It will be noticed that the cash entries last year were in round numbers 877,000 acres; while the entries under the homestead laws amount to 4,418,000 acres, and under the tree-culture law to 1,870,000 acres. And there were other public lands entered.

Now, while this record shows that the entries under the pre-emption laws amounted to 877,000 acres, it must be remembered by the committee that parties entering under the pre-emption law are allowed at any time to change their entry to one under the homestead law or even under the tree-culture law.

But my objection to this bill is because of the fallacy of the sentiment that upholds this measure, which is that this law establishes a fund for education. Even if you let the pre-emption law remain, all or by far the greater part that will come to us under the operation of the existing law will have been received during the next five years; and that the entire amount would not exceed $5,000,000. The amounts alluded to by the gentleman who spoke on the other side were gross receipts and not net receipts.

Therefore this fund which somebody speaks of as a great fund to be built up in the interest of popular education is a thing of the imagination entirely. It would never reach the amount of $5,000,000. Divide that $5,000,000 among all the States of the Union, and bear in mind that after five years the whole amount is to be expended, and then after another five years one-half of the amount is to be expended, and at the end of ten years you will find that there is no fund for investment. Two millions of dollars would certainly be fully equal to the fund that shall remain.

Invest that sum in 4 per cent. bonds and scatter the interest throughout all the States of the Union, to be subject to local legislation, and you will find that there will be no benefit at all to be derived from the fund. If the General Government ought to do something for the States in the South, as I have said once before on this floor, let us go directly to the Treasury. Our great material interests ought not to be jeopardized by this kind of legislation.

There are some interesting facts in connection with our agricultural development during the last two or three years. The great bulk of our exports last year over our imports were agricultural.

The sufferings in the East are being lessened and lightened by this outflow of extra population from it to the West. Will you close up these lands and leave them as now to be pre-empted? I hold and insist that all the remaining agricultural lands of the Republic, almost all of which have been taken up, shall be left for homestead entry by actual settlers seeking homes from the over-crowded cities and the over-populated States of the East. It is in the interest of the whole Republic. No great good can come from this attempt on the part of the Government to make provision for the great common school interest of all the States of the Union.

I wish again to call attention to some of the statistics which I have before me, as showing the increase during the past year in the entries. There was during the last year an increase over the previous fiscal year of 1,348,760 acres. It is this demand for public agricultural lands which I insist ought not at all to be interfered with by this kind of legislation; because I insist, Mr. Chairman, that when Congress shall have made provision in this way for a national educational fund it will be very unlikely to repeal the only way by which that fund can ever be made or increased. We get substantially no money into the Treasury now except under the pre-emption law. It is now proposed to create a fund growing out of the receipts of that item. Then Congress will say "We will keep that law unrepealed." The same votes that appropriated this fund in this way would vote against the repeal of the pre-emption law. I insist that the pre-emption law ought to be repealed. The very small quantity of public lands remaining to be taken up for agricultural purposes would surprise the gentleman from Virginia if I were to present the figures. Hon. George W. Julian caused to be published a year or two ago a statement with regard to the small remaining quantity of public lands adapted to agriculture. That statement startled the country. In Kansas, in Nebraska, and in Minnesota almost all of the lands have been taken up, and forty thousand or fifty thousand or sixty thousand people have under the homestead law gone to the Territory of Dakota during the last twenty-four months. When this agricultural portion of the frontier is occupied you have only the rocky and mineral lands of the country remaining.

When gentlemen picture to themselves a large fund for the purpose of popular education growing out of this measure, they are terribly mistaken; they terribly deceive themselves. The fund could never reach $3,000,000, especially if you allow the whole fund to be spent for five years and one-half for the next five years. When ten years shall have rolled aroundd, Mr. Chairman, if you and I are then cognizant of affairs going on in this country we shall find that the agricultural lands of the country have been taken up and that there is no longer any income from the sale of public lands. I venture to affirm that within ten years from this date thousands instead of millions will cover all returns from the Land Office.

Mr. Chairman I do not wish to speak further at present. Of my remaining time I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. PATTERSON.]

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, while I am not opposed to the principle of the bill, yet, representing in part the interests of the public domain west of the one hundredth meridian, I would be false to that interest if I failed to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole, and particularly of the Committee on Education and Labor, to amendments that are necessary if justice is to be done to the section of the country of which I speak.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] who has preceded me well stated that the limits of revenue from the sales of public lands had been reached years ago, and that from this time forward the annual proceeds must sensibly decrease. The reason of it is apparent. It is that eight-tenths of the public lands remaining undisposed of cannot be successfully cultivated until large sums of money have been expended to place them in a condition to produce crops, by means of water brought upon their surface. The only practicable measure by which this vast area of arid lands can be made productive is by treating them as Congress in 1850 treated the swamp lands of the South, West, and Northwest; that is, by donating them to the several States within which they lie, that they may be made the means and agency of their own redemption. If a law is now passed which irrevocably disposes of this portion of the public domain so that the State may never through them have the means of constructing the works of which I speak, the traveler will find one hundred years from to-day the same vast extent of desert domain that now greets the eye from the Missouri River to the shores of the Pacific as we take the trip across the continent.

Why should not these arid lands be donated to the States before all of the lands are given for purposes of education? If this is not done, no person has the motive and no community has the incentive to furnish the means by which this vast extent of lands may be made productive. Certainly the Government of the United States will not make appropriations for the purpose of constructing canals, ditches, and reservoirs, and certainly the educational interests cannot afford to do it, because to do so would take from the fund the profits from which the good is expected to flow.

Mr. Chairman, under laws passed heretofore upward of fifty-one million acres of swamp lands have been donated to the States for the avowed reason that those lands could not be made productive without the expenditure of vast sums of money for drainage purposes. For the same reasou, before the proceeds of the public lands are expressly set apart for any purpose, and before the lands are disposed of in such a way that the States containing arid lands have lost the hope of obtaining the proceeds by which this desert may be made a garden, by which this arid land may be made the best agricultural area upon the continent, it is due to the entire people, it is right and just that these lands should be granted to the States as I shall request.

Why, Mr. Chairman, in the State I represent, and in other States and Territories, on account of the peculiar nature of our lands and climate, we will be left practically without a school fund unless this and some other propositions I shall propose are adopted. You all know the small proportion of minors to adults in new countries. Men emigrate from the East, leaving behind their wives and children, and come to the West for the purpose of subduing the wilderness and preparing homes to receive them, and this is only accomplished after the lapse of years; and the result of this fact must inevitably be that while South Carolina, New York, Alabama, and other of the older States will receive large sums of these proceeds for the education of their children, Colorado, Nebraska, and Nevada, and the States yet to be carved out of the public domain will not only be left without a proper school fund, but they will be robbed of that which at least the spirit of our institutions has declared shall be set apart for this sacred purpose.

And, Mr. Chairman, I am safe in predicting that if these lands are not given to the States in which they are situated, that a part may be sold and the proceeds applied to the construction of the great irrigating works I have mentioned, the present arid and unproductive plains will continue for a century hence a monument to the ignorance and want of foresight and practical knowledge of the American Congress. And I give notice now that when this measure is being discussed by sections, I shall offer amendments which will exempt from the operations of this bill the arid lands west of the one hundredth meridian, lands which are absolutely worthless without irrigation, that would not bring for school or any other purpose five cents an acre if they were placed on the public market to-day. I shall ask these lands be given to the States, and to be set apart in the Territories to be given to them when they shall become States, so that those who emigrate to the West in future years may, instead of meeting a vast wilderness of non-agricultural lands, find homes prepared for them through the proper expenditure of the proceeds of these arid lands by the governments of the States in which they are situated.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise more for the purpose of stating as a member of the committee I object to the bill than for the purpose of stating my objections. It will be utterly impossible for me to do that in the limited time allowed me.

I am opposed to the bill upon principle and upon policy, and I am opposed to it because the distribution is not equitable and just, even if we agree to the principle. The system of common-school education is one which belongs to the States, to be kept up by the States, to be perpetuated by the States, and not to be interfered with by the General Government. This bill does so interfere with it. It requires the States to file in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States a copy of the law setting forth the fact the State has undertaken to make a faithful application of this money, thereby creating on the part of the General Government a supervision over the application of the school fund appropriated to the States.

But the bill, sir, has many other objections. It provides in the distribution in the first place that after ten years it shall be upon the basis of illiteracy of those between the ages of five and twenty-one years. For the first ten years the basis is not between those ages, but all those who cannot read and write over the age of ten years extending to all the illiterate population, young and old, above the age of ten. Here, then, is an appropriation of money out of the public Treasury for the purpose of educating a man to discharge the duties of citizenship to-day a hundred years of age if you please. If the appropriation is to be made to the States on the basis of illiteracy the age should be between five and twenty-one instead of ten and a hundred or any other limit.

But in addition to that this bill appropriates directly out of the public Treasury some amount of money. It is called the proceeds of the public lands, and the quantity therefore is uncertain. It may be one million, and it may be ten millions. I find the sales of the public lands have ranged from $24,000,000 in 1836 to one million and one million and a half in later years. This revenue might as well be taken from the receipts from internal revenue or from customs duties as from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, for it is none the less a direct appropriation of the money of the people.

There is in some instances a liberal system of education supported by liberal taxation and munificent appropriation on the part of the people for the support of the public schools. I venture the prediction, while I have not the statistics before me to prove it, that many of those States which will be compelled to contribute by taxation to this fund are now paying a school-tax of twice or thrice the amount of those States which will receive the benefit of this fund. It is therefore a premium for neglect and ignorance instead of a premium for greater effort in the direction of education. I do not wish to say anything against those States which have failed to educate, or whose people by misfortune remain ignorant, but I do say when we come to appropriate money out of the public Treasury to a school-fund we ought not to require one man in one section of the country who pays two mills on the dollar to pay an additional mill to educate men who do not pay as much in the way of taxation in another section.

For these reasons, or suggestions, which I have not the time to elaborate, I am utterly opposed to the passage of this bill, and being a member of the committee I have deemed it fit to state them at this time.

Mr. GOODE. Before the gentleman from Ohio sits down I wish, with his permission, to correct one of his statements. He has fallen into an error. If he examines the statistics he will see that since the war, up to 1870, and from that time to this, for every 1 per cent. on his property that the northerner has paid for public education, the citizen in the most impoverished Southern State has paid 2 per cent.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD. In previous Congresses when this subject was under consideration I have supported measures which contained the principle on which this bill is framed, but I think there is great force in the objections which are urged by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.] I am not satisfied that the bill will be practicable as it is framed and presented by the committee. So far as the constitutional question is concerned, as to the right of Congress to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands or donate the public lands for the encouragement of schools, I think that question is settled by precedent if not by logic, and it is unnecessary to discuss it.

There is one feature of the measure that commends it to favorable consideration and was urged very forcibly in the Forty-first Congress. Every part of this nation is interested in the education of every other part. The right of suffrage, which is now universal, determines the character of the National Congress and the policy and public measures that shall control the nation. Legislation that concerns every part of the Union will be affected by the intelligence and culture of the people who select the Representatives. We therefore are interested in education in South Carolina, in the education of the freedmen of that country, in the education of the freedmen of the South, and of the youth of the country all over the land. And if a practical measure were proposed not to take in hand the education of the youth of the country, but to encourage each State under State law to commence a system of free schools for the free education of all the children in the State, I would be glad to support it. Such I believe was the proposition first introduced in the House in 1870 contained in a bill presented by myself and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Its sole purpose was to aid and encourage the establishment of free schools in portions of the country that failed to appreciate or were struggling to maintain a free-school system. The cash sales of public lands for the preceding year had amounted to over $4,000,000. Distributed to school districts only that should maintain free schools for all their children for six months of the year, it would be an inducement for every district to tax itself, build school-houses, and engage teachers, so that it could obtain a portion of this fund. But this bill abandons these important features and the main object of the original plan. It gives the money to the State, one-fourth to be appropriated for agricultural colleges or for such other purpose as the State may direct. The remainder can be applied by the State for the free education of all its children in such manner as it sees fit. At the end of five years one-half, and at the end of ten years all of this fund, instead of being applied as it accrues to start these feeble schools, is to be put at interest, and the latter only applied. But 4 per cent. of the fund could be annually used, a sum too small to be of practical benefit at a time when most needed.

There are serious objections to the bill. One-fourth of the amount is to be appropriated, not for the support and maintenance of free schools and their encouragement, but for the colleges, those institutions that ought to and can support themselves. Then again, as was said by the gentleman from Minnesota, the net cash receipts from the sale of the public lands amounts to nothing at the present time. I have before me the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and gentlemen will find at page 12 the statement that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the last year amounted only to $1,079,743. Out of that, by this bill, comes very properly the expense for surveys and the expense of the surveyor-general's and the subordinate surveyors' offices, amounting to $362,000. Deduct that and the expense of the Land Office, for which $245,680 was appropriated for the present fiscal year, and you will have about $600,000 expenses to be deducted, leaving less than $500,000 net cash receipts, while the fund is growing less and less. Put that $500,000 at interest at 4 per cent., and you have $20,000. Give one-fourth of it to the agricultural colleges and you have $15,000 left; then divide that, and how much would each of the States receive? How much would any one of the twenty thousand school districts in Illinois receive annually? Not ten cents each.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. The object of this bill, Mr. Chairman, is to derive a fund from the public lands in the West with which to educate the illiterate of the South. Under its provisions the States and Territories in which the public lands lie will get practically nothing, although whatever value the public lands have is given them by the efforts of our people, by the labor which has reclaimed and developed them. The gifts of vast bodies of territory by two at least of the older States to the General Government is extensively dwelt on as a reason that the proceeds of the public lands should now be given largely back to those States. What value had those territories at the time they were so granted? How much would the shadowy title derived from the kings which the colonies had just repudiated have brought in any market? Filled with Indians, it would have impoverished the States that claimed them to defend or develop them. Settlers went in, drove out the savages, conquered the country, and reclaimed it from its wild condition. To-day it is valuable; but reckon the labor and money that has been used to make it so, and you will find that the sum will equal the value of the land to-day, leaving very little margin for any value in the musty patents of kings who granted away continents that did not belong to them and lands which never had even been explored.

The old States and colonies all had the benefit of all the land within their own borders. Its proceeds they used for purposes of development, to build roads, bridges, schools, and to pay the expenses of the State, all of which has to be borne by the new States and Territories to-day, while the proceeds of the land within their borders, land deriving its only value from their settlement and their labor, goes into the coffers of the General Treasury.

If any general grant of this land and of its proceeds is to be made, let it be given to the States and Territories in which it lies. Especially should this be done in the Territories where all the lands are arid, where they must be brought under irrigation before they can be cultivated, and where, as my friend from Colorado has so ably shown you, they are not likely to be redeemed by any other disposition of them.

So far as the Territories are concerned, the school lands that are reserved cannot be utilized to assist their struggling communities to educate their people. They are tied up until we shall become States, and there is a growing disposition against the admission of new States. The Delegates have in several Congresses introduced bills to utilize our school lands, to make them yield us some revenue, no matter how small, but this scheme of general distribution now under consideration has stood in their way, and its advocates in and out of Congress have antagonized our modest demands.

This bill is only an indirect way of doing that which the Government should do directly, if at all. If we want a national educational fund, let it be voted directly from the Treasury, so that you can depend on a stated and reliable sum. By what rule of computation, by what statistics, by what means can you definitely and correctly calculate the net proceeds of the public lands? You deduct the cost of surveys; you deduct the expense of the Land Office; but is that all? Why, sir, here is your Indian appropriation bill of $5,000,000 a year. What does that represent? Upon what ground are you called upon to vote that gratuity to the Indians? Upon the ground that it is an equivalent for the purchase money for their lands, and the sum that you appropriate amounts to vastly more every year than not merely the net but the gross annual proceeds of the whole public lands of the United States. Therefore it would seem that if the proceeds of the public lands are to be devoted to any specific purpose whatever, that fund has in the practice of the Government already been set aside to pay the treaty obligations incurred in regard to the purchase money of the lands themselves.

Upon what ground is this source of revenue selected for this purpose more than any other? Why is it selected rather than the tax on tobacco or the tax on beer? I suppose, as the friends of the bill would seem to argue, it is because the Government has already set an example in this direction by setting apart at its public land sales a certain amount of lands as school lands in the West. And we are told of the vast educational fund which these Western States have been blessed with by having lands thus appropriated, demanding that the old States should have an offset. Why, sir, if the Government set apart two sections of land in every township for this purpose, for what reason did it do this? In order to sell the rest of the township. It was an inducement to purchasers, a part of the plan by means of which the Government was enabled to dispose of its lands. And we are reminded that the West was built up because Government has given lands to endow and promote and aid our railway corporations in that way. Well, then, who has paid for this land? Has the Government paid for it, or lost anything by such grants? No, sir; not at all. When you make a grant to a railroad what do you do? On every alternate section you double the price; so that the same amount of money comes into the public Treasury; and it is not the Government, but the western settler on these alternate sections who pays for the construction of the railroad. If you owned the land on one side of Pennsylvania avenue and gave away every second lot to any man who would build a house, and then doubled the price of the remaining lots, would that be giving away anything to anybody? It would be part of the means by which you disposed of your property. And the setting aside of these two sections in each township for school purposes and of doubling the price on alternate railroad sections are the means by which the Government has disposed of its property in these Western States. In all its grants it has been very careful to get value received for its gifts to the West.

Now, sir, let us look at the basis upon which the proceeds of these lands are about to be divided under this bill. They are to be divided upon the basis of illiteracy. In my Territory, from which perhaps a million of revenue will soon be derived every year, although lands are classed as arid and are only made valuable by the work we put upon them on irrigating and redeeming them, what do we get under this bill? There are, as I think the last census showed, an extremely small percentage, a very few hundred people in that whole Territory, who cannot read and write. So that our entire proportion of dividends would not amount to $50 a year. We have no school lands that are available. Our reserved school sections are not certified up to us. We levy the highest rate of taxation in any community in this country, higher than in any State except one, in order to educate the young people of the frontier, in order to educate the children, without getting any revenue from our school lands, and those struggling communities will derive no benefit under this act; although it is their enterprise and labor that gives the public land its only value.

If this Congress wants to meet this question, let it meet it manfully. Let it appropriate an annual sum from the public Treasury for educational purposes. If it is for the purpose of educating the freedmen, let it say so. I think it is due to the South that the General Government should assist in the education of the freedmen. When they were liberated and enfranchised they should have been educated. But let the Government do it directly, and not at the expense of the Western Territories. All the States had the full heritage of their own lands, and the proceeds, if there are any, of the public domain go into the public Treasury, where we have not even a vote on its disposition.

The vast domain of the United States ought not to be looked upon as a source of revenue. You are debating changes in your land laws, in your surveys, in your method of disposing of the public lands. You have added to your land laws the desert-land act, which works well enough in some cases, but under the provisions of which lurk excellent opportunities for monopoly; so that capitalists and speculators by taking up lands next the creeks and rivers will in the new Territories soon control all the lands and stop the progress of settlement. New restrictions should be added to that law to prevent that result. But the best disposition that you can make of your lands is to grant them to the States and Territories in which they lie, under such guards as will insure that the farming lands shall be held as homes for the people, the grazing lands leased or otherwise utilized by the Territories, and the timber lands kept and nurtured for the common good; the school lands made a source of revenue to educate the young; so that each Territory should have, as all the older States and colonies did have, the benefits arising from the control of its own lands.

Then you can dispense with an army of office-holders who eat up the revenues arising from their sale. But if this seems too radical I hope the committee which reports this bill will take up the bill which the Territories have had before it in three Congresses, to allow us to dispose of part of our school lands, invest the money in good securities, and apply the proceeds to assist our struggling schools. New countries have heavy expenses, bridges to build, school-houses, court-houses, jails, and asylums to erect, roads to open, governments to inaugurate, and they should not be at their utmost need deprived of that governmental aid which is granted to older communities in less need of assistance. But if this bill is to pass I shall move to amend so that the distribution will be made upon the basis of population instead of the basis of illiteracy. Even on the basis of population our share would be small, but under the bill as it is while our lands would furnish the funds our schools would get absolutely none of the proceeds.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I was very much impressed with the observations of my friend from Minnesota in antagonism to the general policy of this bill. Few measures have come before the American Congress—certainly no measure has come before the Forty-fifth Congress—more important in its general policy than the pending measure. Gentlemen by a careful reading of the law on the subject of the disposition of the public lands and of the provisions of this bill will discover that this bill if enacted into a law will institute a radical, a marked change in the existing disposition of the public lands.

What is the thought of this bill in a word, for I have not time for discussion? The thought of this bill in a word is that the provisions of the existing pre-emption system to regulate the disposition of the public lands, instead of devoting the proceeds to the ordinary expenses of the Government they are to be appropriated exclusively to education in the different States. That would change the policy of the American Congress for which so many of us have contended to popular audiences throughout the country. It is very well known that one of the most beneficent measures of the nineteenth century which the American Congress offered to the people of the country was what is known as the homestead law, and if you enact this bill into a law you change that policy entirely and instead of opening the vast acres of the West as an invitation to the people in the overcrowded cities, you will put them immediately in the market. It is probably the case that while this measure does not invade the pre-emption system to-day, yet it is but the commencement of further legislation that will lead ultimately to the adoption of a land-scrip policy, such as was authorized by the act of 1862 which appropriated thirty thousand acres of the public lands for each congressional district in the different States and for each Senator to be devoted to a certain policy.

Now, it is very well known as a matter of experience that that resulted in the formation of rings and circles and combinations, and the practical advantage of that legislation was withdrawn from education in general and inured to the benefit of certain individuals who, by combinations, enriched themselves. Gentlemen talk of benefiting the people at large and lightening their burdens. The other day I was delighted to hear the liberal sentiments expressed by gentlemen on the other side of the House, who were advocating the improvement of the Mississippi River and the bill for the improvement of the Mississippi levees. Sir, that is a great question that affects the industries of the country, and it will press itself in some shape or form upon the attention of the American Congress, and I should like for one, as living upon some of the streams that are tributary to the Ohio and the Mississippi, to use a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to aid in those improvements in this way, and so subserve the material industries of the country. I have not time to discuss the general policy of this measure, or the particular features in detail of the bill. It is obnoxious generally as a matter of discrimination, and I think I am not affected by any mere local prejudices in this behalf.

It is very well understood that the States which have the largest proportion of illiterate population will be the largest beneficiaries under this bill. Now I submit, with all deference to the South, with all deference to the States lately in insurrection and which are so unfortunate as to have so large a proportion of their population illiterate and uneducated, that it is unfair to give them the advantages resulting from this bill to the prejudice of other sections of the country. The State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor has been one of the most liberal-minded States upon the subject of education in the Union. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania was the pioneer in the great cause of education, under the lead of Thaddeus Stevens and Governor Wolf. The free-school system was established in Pennsylvania in 1835. Gentlemen may talk about the burdens of taxation, about the weight of 2½ per cent. of taxation resting upon them for educational purposes. Why, sir, in some portions of my State to-day I can tell you that they pay 2½ per cent. for school taxes, for school-buildings, and for educational purposes; and they have borne and borne and borne this taxation and built up an educational system there without the aid of the General Government that excites the admiration of every intelligent man.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am really afraid that this bill has failed to create within me an amiable spirit. We have had for the last week but one run, one unvaried run, of discussion, but one run of attempted legislation. The whole course of things during the week has been for using the public money for the benefit of one portion of this Union. It was, first, the Mississippi levees—$4,000,000 for Louisiana; secondly, an announcement from the same State of a demand for $80,000,000 more; thirdly came the Fairfax Seminary; fourthly, we have had a war claim from somewhere down in Tennessee; and fifthly, to-day we have a proposition to give away the proceeds of the entire national domain which shall be sold to one section of the Union, and to the same section that has been consuming all our time and claiming all our money for a week past.

Ah, but this is for a holy purpose; this is for the cause of education; this is for the cause of improvement! Sir, I was educated in the true old-fashioned school of national democracy, that believed that the business of education belonged to the State and not to the National Government, and that the burden of education rested upon the State and not upon the General Government; and I have not given up that faith. I do not believe that the National Government has any right to engage in the business of education in the States. I believe, so far as the National Government is concerned, that every State has a State right to have as much illiteracy as it chooses. [Laughter.] I would guarantee, as we all conceded before the war that desolated our country, that every State has a right to be as ignorant as it has a mind to be. [Continued laughter.] I do not believe in taking fifty millions of the future proceeds of the sales of the public lands, when this country is looking about to see how we can raise revenue enough to carry on the Government and pay the interest upon our debt, and giving it away to anybody, even to ourselves.

I am compelled to say that it is past all human patience to be compelled to sit here and see these calm and adroit and oily propositions to rob the loyal States of the Union, those that were loyal in our great controversy, of their interest in the public lands.

Let me put this question: how much will Vermont get under this bill of the proceeds of the public lands? Scarcely a cent. Why? Because from the time the little Mountain State was organized she has educated her people at her own expense. The poor men in Vermont are not only protected by the legislation of the State, but their children are educated by the State. And some of the sons of the poor men of Vermont are sitting in this House to-day. So it is in my own native State of Massachusetts, so it is with Maine, and so it is with all the New England States, and I am proud to say so it is with New York.

Now because we taxed ourselves to educate our people we are to be thimble-rigged and cajoled out of our interest in the great public domain of the country. Sir, I am not ready for it, [here the hammer fell,] and I end as I began by saying that the proposition does not put me into a good humor. [Great laughter.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I began my remarks at the commencement of the time allowed me by alluding simply and solely to this question from a material stand-point. I have not been disposed to bring in the war, or the South, or the North. Nor have I been disposed to discuss the question except upon the position which I assume that it was a policy which we could not at this time afford to inaugurate; that the granting of the proceeds of the public lands for this purpose would and must necessarily interfere with the free legislation of the country touching the use of the public lands and their appropriation for the public good; that these public lands belonging to the whole country ought not now to be looked upon as a sort of revenue either for the Treasury of the United States or for any specified purpose.

The lands now remaining we ought carefully to take care of, that they may contribute to our material development, to our growth, to our enlargement, and to our enrichment. I am opposed to such a disposition of these public lands as will prevent Congress from freely legislating concerning them so that they may be used for the extension of the country itself.

I insist again that if the real facts of the case could be brought before the House it would at once appear evident how small a quantity of agricultural lands there are remaining, and how absolutely useless and fruitless would be the results of a bill like this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has expired. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. GOODE. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING.]

Mr. LORING addressed the committee. [For his remarks see the Appendix.]

Mr. GOODE. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Chairman, I voted this morning to take up this bill for consideration by the House. I voted against taking up, or virtually did so, the reports in favor of war claims. The reason of my vote was simply this: I am in favor of this bill and opposed to the bills providing for the payment of war claims. This was the stand-point from which I voted. Others doubtless had a different stand-point. I state this to explain my own position. I voted in favor of taking up the bill which I wished to pass.

I have listened with great interest to the remarks made in opposition to this bill. I hope I have listened with candor. I was not able to hear all that has been said against it. I did happen to hear, I believe, all the points made by my friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.] I always listen to him with interest, and I feel great sympathy with him in some of the things he said on this subject.

The gentleman from Minnesota, and perhaps some others, have stated that this is a question for the States and not for the General Government. I admit that the principal responsibility for the education of the youth of a State must rest upon the people of that State. With that opinion I entirely agree; but it does not and should not prevent the General Government in certain emergencies from rendering the State some encouragement. May not the General Government come forward as a helper of education in the States? Why, sir, to ask the question is to answer it. We have a great number of precedents in favor of it. The National Government has repeatedly applied its property for the benefit of education in the States, and it is too late to call in question either its constitutionality or its propriety.

Thus, while I admit that the principal responsibility in regard to education must rest upon the States, there is a certain degree of responsibility resting upon the Government.

And I would say, Mr. Chairman, that I first became in favor of a bill like this when I first became in favor of adopting the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I was heartily in favor of that amendment. I sustained it with all the influence I had. I was glad when that amendment was adopted. I wished to make voters of the men to whom liberty had been given in the South, and when I became in favor of giving the right of suffrage to all the adult colored population of the country, from that moment I also became in favor of having the National Government do something to help in the work of their education.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I suppose this Government must have conferred the right of suffrage upon nearly a million of voters by a single act, and that at least the large majority of these voters could neither read nor write. My view of duty and propriety for the National Government, in connection with that matter, may be summed up in a single sentence. I do not believe this Government has a right to make voters of a million of men and then leave them in a state of such black ignorance that they can neither read nor write. I do not believe this Government has any right to do such an act as that, and ever since I went with all my friends here in support of the fifteenth amendment I have held it to be one of my first duties as a citizen, and especially as a citizen supporting that amendment, to try to do something toward helping to educate these hundreds of thousands of men whom we clothed in a day with the sovereignty of suffrage and to whom in a large measure we committed the destinies of this great empire.

And, as one man, bound to act on my conscience and honest judgment in this House, I cannot and I will not, I dare not refuse to vote for a measure that proposes to help, although it be only in some very humble degree, toward fitting those men for the discharge of the solemn responsibilities we have put upon them. It is cruel to them, it is cruel to ourselves, it is cruel to the whole people to give this multitude the right of suffrage and then leave them in darkness.

My friend from Minnesota remarked that each State would get but a small sum under this bill. I admit it is smaller than I could wish. I was surprised my friend did not find some consolation in this from his stand-point, because if the States are to get so very little out of the bill it cannot work the mischief which he fears may come from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MONROE. I ask for a moment more.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONROE. The amount each State would receive would be small; but it would furnish some welcome aid, it would impart stimulus and inspiration to a good cause, and its moral effect would be great.

I am sorry it would be so small. I have said in the presence of a large State convention of my own State I would cheerfully vote for an appropriation of $3,000,000 a year out of the Treasury for the purpose of common-school education in the States, such was my sense of the nation's peril from the illiteracy of a portion of its citizens.

I would be willing to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota to vote money out of the Treasury instead of passing such a bill as this. But as public sentiment has never run in that direction and as our people seem more favorable to applying the proceeds of the public lands for that purpose, I have cheerfully voted for that.

I want to say that although the State of Ohio would perhaps profit as little as most Northern States under this bill, I have yet to find any neighbor or acquaintance of mine at home who has objected to my giving my hearty and earnest support to a proposition of this kind. The people of Ohio feel that ignorance, in whatever State it may exist, is the common enemy of the whole country. They feel that ignorance among the voters of Mississippi is as really an evil which they must deal with, and the ruinous effects of which may fall upon them, as ignorance in Ohio.

The gentleman from Minnesota found some fault with this bill on account of its connection with the homestead question. Of course he is aware that the bill is most carefully guarded in that respect. Language could not be employed with greater clearness or force than the language that is used in this bill to keep the homestead act sacred and intact. There is no interference whatever under this bill with any of our existing legislation in regard to the public lands of the United States. Everything is left exactly as it has been. My friend from Minnesota says that the pre-emption law ought to be repealed; but, Mr. Chairman, it has not been repealed. We have gone on year after year selling the public lands. Now, this bill does not undertake to decide what ought to be done with the pre-emption law. It merely comes in and proposes that as it has been for a long time the fixed custom of the United States to sell their public lands and to pay the money into the Treasury, that money shall be applied for the benefit of all the children of all the States in proportion to their educational needs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by the House for general debate has expired. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

That the net proceeds of sales of public lands are hereby forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people: Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands or the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain or interfere with granting bounty lands.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 1 the following:
Or grants in aid of public improvements.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say a word in reference to this amendment. It will be seen that the first proviso in the bill, as a limitation on the first clause, is:

Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands or the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands.

This is followed by another proviso:

And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain, or interfere with granting bounty lands.

To that, I propose to add:

Or grants in aid of public improvements.

I called the attention to this point of the gentleman who reported the bill, and his impression, as well as the impression of the committee, is that the right of Congress to appropriate lands for the purposes contemplated in the amendment is contained in the second proviso, which says:

That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain.

Upon examining the section I find it may be possible that such a construction could be reached, but it would not be the natural construction, as it seems to me, of the bill to assume that that reservation is contained in the clause referred to. The exemption here in the two provisos points to the purposes over which the power of Congress shall be exercised with reference to the public lands. The words which it is thought reserve to Congress the power asked for by the amendment might be construed to refer to the exceptions expressly named in the two provisos. Supposing that that may be so, and as the amendment simply renders plain and certain the opinion of the gentleman who reports the bill, and of the committee, it can do no harm to the bill to adopt it and will certainly make it clear of criticism and of doubt upon that subject; and I trust it will be the pleasure of the House to adopt it.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDEN. How can this bill affect the lands that have been granted for public improvements unless the grant has lapsed?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois apprehends the point I am making. My object is to make an amendment which will authorize the Congress without doubt, if it sees proper to do so, in the future to make an appropriation of public lands for the purpose of making public improvements.

Mr. GOODE. I will say that I am not authorized by the committee to accept any amendments, but for my own part I see no objection to this one.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I have not yielded the floor and I desire to use the balance of my five minutes. No one will doubt that the efforts of the Government to secure a great line across the continent has been of incalculable benefit to the United States. I mean the line of the Union Pacific Railroad. Whatever may be said of the large grants of land and the large amount of money given to that great enterprise, to-day the United States is better off for it than if it had not been carried out. Although a good deal of it may have been improvidently done, no one can well estimate its vast importance to the people of the United States. We may want a competing line or two across the continent in order that we may better carry out the purposes of the Government, secure more perfectly the public defense, and promote the interests of commerce and the general welfare of the country. No one can doubt the necessity now, great as that enterprise is, of having competing lines that shall secure in the interest of the Government and the people the reduction of the cost of transportation; and I do not wish to see the hands of Congress tied so that it cannot aid in the accomplishment of that purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRISON. I had no intention, Mr. Chairman, to say a word upon this bill; but, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas strikes out one of the very best features of the bill, and that is, the placing of the public domain in such a position that corporations will not always be knocking at the doors of Congress for it to give to them a part of what belongs to the people. It is one of the doctrines of the democratic party to-day not to give subsidies for any improvement of this sort either in money or in lands. Sir, it is a part of the doctrine of the democratic party that we will hold the public domain for the people.

We may say that to give it for educational purposes will take it from the people; but an amendment based upon the very position that we may want to give it to private corporations is one that the democratic party in this House cannot sustain.

One of the very best features, as I said, in this whole bill is that we will array always in the future the Congressmen from every State against any such claims upon Congress for assistance to private corporations when it is given to the people.

I do not say that I will vote for this bill; but, sir, if this bill passes and becomes a law it will place every Congressman upon the one side of taking care of this property for the education of the children of their constituents, and therefore they will always be hard to be reached when corporations come and ask them to give it to them.

I oppose the amendment. If there is any doubt upon this subject I would rather see an amendment excepting from this provision the capacity of Congress to give to any private enterprise, be it a railroad, be it a canal, or be it a river, in the future.

Mr. MILLS. I simply rise to ask some questions. If I understand the bill, it gives $1,500,000 of the public lands to be distributed in a certain manner among several States for educational purposes. Now, I want to know if that $1,500,000 does not have to be supplied again to the Treasury for the payment of the necessary expenditures of the Government, and if it has we are simply robbing Peter to pay Paul. We have no revenue to give away. The Secretary of the Treasury informs us that there will be a deficiency and that we shall have to increase taxation.

If we take this $1,500,000, where are you going to impose the taxation necessary to supply it? Where do you propose to supply this $1,500,000 which you are to take from the revenues of the Government? By indirect taxation of the people.

You will have to impose this taxation upon the blankets, sheets, shoes, hats, socks, and all those things.

You will have to increase the taxation upon these articles in order to supply this $1,500,000, and the people are seduced by a sham and not the reality.

We are to take this $1,500,000 from the sale of the public lands, and then lay the heavy hand of taxation on labor, for capital will pay not a dollar of it.

The first tax relieved by the Congress of the United States is the tax that falls upon the wealth of the country.

When the war was over, what did you release from taxation? What tax did you release that the poor man pays? Did you release the taxation upon the articles that protect from the chilly blasts of winter? Did you release the taxation on cotton goods?

You released the tax on incomes. You stipulated that the bonds should not pay any tax.

You released the tax upon the insurance companies and the railroad companies, and put the burden of supporting the whole Government upon the laboring class.

You propose now to give this money for educational purposes that you may make further exactions upon the poor, toiling, tax-ridden, persecuted people of the United States. [Applause in the gallery.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do not propose to discuss the merits of this bill. I simply desire to say a few words explaining why I am opposed to its passage. I deeply sympathize with every effort to promote the education of the people and all classes of the people in all sections of the country, but I am opposed to this bill because for a good many years I have had a strong conviction that all our public domain ought to be reserved for the benefit of the people in securing to actual settlers homesteads. I would give to every man who would go upon the public lands a certain quantity of the public domain, and let him make for himself and his family a home upon it. It would make him a better citizen, more deeply interested in the Government and in its prosperity and preservation.

While I would gladly aid education in the North and in the South and every part of the country, I believe that if any mistake has been made in our Government in the management of its public domain it has been in allowing large bodies of our public lands to be appropriated to corporations and purchased by individuals, when they ought to have been reserved for the people for homesteads.

Mr. Chairman, I would think it far better for the country and for our people, and especially if the proceeds are to be given away, not to sell an acre of the public lands, but give them to actual settlers who would enter upon them in good faith and make homes for themselves and their families; and, believing this to be a better disposition of the public domain than to sell it and give away the proceeds for any purpose, I am opposed to this bill. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out the last word.

I understood the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] to say that it was the policy of the democratic party to favor the preservation of the public lands for the people of the country. Let me say that I congratulate that party and the country if that is now its policy, for when we remember the history of our country we know that among the last acts of the last democratic President of the United States (Buchanan)—and I trust he will ever be the last—was the veto of a homestead bill. He vetoed the bill because, as he said, "the granting of homesteads was a boon exclusively conferred upon the cultivators of the soil" that ought not to be granted. He vetoed the bill because, as he said, it would "prove unequal and unjust in its operation, because from its very nature it is confined to one class of persons;" and that in his opinion it was not expedient to proclaim to all nations of the earth that all foreigners "shall receive a farm of one hundred and sixty acres of land;" and that it is agrarian in principle. He did it because he said it was a charity to the poor that he did not favor. The gentleman will find that memorable veto message dated the 22d of June, 1860.

I rose for the purpose of stating and putting in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the great things that have grown out of the republican homestead law, a law passed by a republican Congress; a law which had the approval of Abraham Lincoln, a republican President. It was passed upon the 20th of May, 1862, and under that law there have been 384,848 homestead entries made, covering a territory in extent, if you deduct 10 per cent. of the whole number for canceled and abandoned entries, exceeding the whole of England, Scotland, and Wales. It exceeds by 10,000,000 of acres the whole of the territory of the New England States. The area in acres of New England is 43,742,720; the area of land taken up by actual settlers under a republican homestead law, after making the deduction mentioned, is 55,418,112 acres.

It exceeds more than twice the area of my own State, the State of Ohio. The area of Ohio is 25,576,960 acres. After due allowance for canceled and abandoned entries, under the homestead law 350,000 heads of families have acquired homes. Such are the fruits of the policy of the republican party in relation to the public domain, and in spite of the policy of the democratic party of old. I congratulate that party that it has been educated up to-day by the republican party, though it has taken nearly twenty years to do it, to a point where it is in favor of homesteads.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to ask the gentleman what bill did any republican President ever veto granting millions upon millions of acres of the public lands to private corporations?

Mr. KEIFER. I am frank to say that the great champion of democracy in the State of Illinois initiated the policy of granting public lands to railroad corporations; I refer to Stephen Arnold Douglas, of Illinois.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to have the gentleman answer my question. And then I would like to have him answer the question whether Mr. Douglas did not have these lands given to the State of Illinois and not to a corporation? Read history and you will find that the democratic party has not been the one to set the example of giving the public lands to private corporations.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman is entirely wrong in his statement. The land was granted to the State of Illinois in trust for railroad purposes.

Mr. SPARKS. Still it was granted to the State and not to a corporation.

Mr. KEIFER. It was granted to the State of Illinois for the benefit of the Illinois Central Railroad; there is where it went.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KIEFER. The following is the table to which I referred:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, July 20, 1878.

J. A. WILLIAMSON, Commissioner.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that we could discuss this issue without running it into politics. I had hoped that the time had come when we could take up a great national measure in which every man, woman, and child in our country feels a common interest, and discuss it without dropping down into the political issues of the day. But it seems that some of my friends on the other side of the House cannot do this thing.

The lands of the United States belong to the whole people. They are the common inheritance of all the people, purchased by the blood and treasure of the people of all the States of the Union. Even the cost of surveying these lands is paid from the taxes collected from all the people of the country. I contend, therefore, that the public domain of this country belongs to the people of the State of Maine as well as to the people of the State of Colorado. We have a common interest in these lands.

I will say to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and who has seen fit to ring politics into this discussion, that it was the democratic party that acquired the great Northwestern Territory, that made the Louisiana purchase: that it was the democratic party that acquired Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Nevada, and California.

And what has the republican party acquired? It has acquired the little, far-off, worthless Territory of Alaska, and that you have given to a corporation, although the people of the whole United States paid for it.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman——

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not yield to the gentleman. When I am through the gentleman can answer me.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the gentleman to ask me a question, and I want to answer it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If the gentleman will keep still now he can have the floor after I am through. The democratic party acquired all this vast domain; they paid for it. The people of the States of Maine and New York and Alabama and Mississippi and of all the States of this Union contributed their portion toward paying for it; yet the republican party during the last few years has given away nearly three hundred million of acres of the public lands to railroad monopolies, and has taken from the public Treasury nearly $40,000,000 to pay the interest on the bonds of those corporations. A friend near me says that it will require $150,000,000 before we get through with it. Now, we of the democratic party hope to save what few acres of the public domain are left for the benefit of the whole people of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] wait until I can answer the questions which were put to me?

Mr. EDEN. I wish to have my amendment read.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. It can be read afterward. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. EDEN. I decline to yield now. I do not want a political discussion; I want business.

The Clerk read the proposed substitute, as follows:

And provided further, That all the public lands which have been granted by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and telegraph lines, which have not been earned under such grants, and which have lapsed by reason of the failure to complete such roads and telegraph lines within the time limited by law, are hereby declared forfeited to the United States, and shall hereafter be disposed of as other public lands of the United States, and shall be subject to the provisions of this act.

Mr. EDEN. I offer this amendment in the utmost good faith. Early in the last session I introduced a bill and had it referred to the Committee on Public Lands, providing that these lapsed land grants should be restored to the public domain of the country and made subject to entry under the homestead and pre-emption law, in order that they might be for the benefit of the whole people of this country, instead of for the benefit of a few great corporations.

I understand that about one hundred million acres of public lands that have been granted to railroad corporations have lapsed by reason of a failure of the companies to complete the roads within the time limited by law. But, under the construction of the law, until there is some action on the part of Congress those lands are not restored to the public domain of the country, but are still subject to the use of those corporations as fast as they shall complete their work.

If we intend to devote any portion of the public domain or the entire remainder of it to the cause of education, I desire that there shall be from this source a sum of money that will be of some value. This can only be obtained by restoring to the public domain this great empire that has been granted to railroad corporations. When this is done, we shall have in our Treasury something out of which can be realized a fund to educate the people of this country.

I do not say that I am in favor of the provisions of this bill; but if my amendment be adopted it will go a long way toward reconciling my constitutional scruples upon this subject. From the sale of these one hundred million acres of the people's land heretofore granted to these private corporations, the Government will not only obtain a fund from which to aid the people of this country in obtaining an education, but it will benefit the poor men of the country by enabling them to settle upon the public lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws.

I think it time that we should legislate in the cause of the laboring people of this country; and I know no means by which we can do this so well as by restoring these one hundred million acres to the public domain, and allowing the hard-fisted working people of the country to settle on these lands under the provisions of the homestead and pre-emption laws. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ELAM. Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether there is any great virtue in this bill. I predict that the children of the United States of educable age will not get under this measure a dollar a year each. In short, I am inclined to think that this bill is a farce. The States will still have to support their own schools. I have always been in favor of a system of free public education. As a public man and as a private citizen I have always advocated liberal appropriations for the education of the youth of my State.

I have risen, however, mainly for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.] I think, sir, that there has been (to use a vulgarism) a "great cry and very little wool" about these donations to railroads. Look at the great Western States, that raise nothing but wheat and corn; how would the people of these States get their products to market without these railroad conveniences? Railroads as means of transportation have almost entirely taken the place of even the greatest rivers in the United States. The tonnage on the Mississippi River is not one-fifth what it was twenty years ago, notwithstanding the immense increase of population on the upper part of that river.

Now, sir, other States have been richly endowed with grants of public lands; a munificent grant was made to the State of Illinois in 1856 to enable her to build the Illinois Central Railroad. The Southern States, or at least some of them, have not enjoyed similar advantages, my own State in particular. Although grants of land have been made, yet only about seventy miles of road have been built under those grants. I think it unfair that my State (and perhaps others are in the same situation) should not be permitted to participate equally in this sort of legislation.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. What did the National Government lose by the grant of lands to the State of Illinois?

Mr. ELAM. I do not believe it lost a cent. On the contrary, by reason of this grant the reserved sections were sold at double minimum price.

Mr. SPARKS. Yes, sir; the alternate sections were doubled in price, and those lands were all sold.

Mr. ELAM. I understand that.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That is the way with every railroad grant.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] what the Government has lost in any State or Territory by granting lands for railroads?

Mr. SPARKS. It has lost the lands; and by the grant to the Union Pacific Railroad it has lost I do not know how many million dollars; I have not the exact figures at hand.

Mr. EDEN. Sixty-four million dollars besides the interest.

Mr. SPARKS. At the same time I know that the Government lost no dollar and no cent by its grant of lands made to the State of Illinois—not to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, as gentlemen say. Those lands were granted to the State.

Mr. ELAM. I cannot yield for further interruption. I apprehend that these great arteries of commerce that have been built up in this way by donations of the public lands have been of incalculable value to the States in which they have been constructed, especially to the Northwestern States.

Now, sir, I say it is not fair that the grant which has been made, for instance, to the State of Louisiana by the act of 3d June, 1856, shall be rendered null and void. Those lands were conveyed to the Vicksburgh and Shreveport Railroad; and though according to the construction put upon these grants by the Supreme Court of the United States, and which has been followed by the Land Office, nevertheless those lands still belong to the State to be devoted to the purposes for which they were originally granted; if I understand the scope of the amendment it would repeal all such grants except where the lands have been earned by the construction of a certain number of miles of railroad. I am opposed to it and shall vote against it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would not trouble the House at this late hour of the evening were it not there were very important considerations involved in the pending subject, which seriously affect not only my own constituents, but the constituents of many other gentlemen. The opposition to this bill and the object of the amendment now offered is to prevent, if possible, the grant of the proceeds of the sales of any public lands for the purpose of carrying on the general education of the people. If there can be one reason above another demanding the recognition of education on the part of Congress it must surely be in the vast number of those who are illiterate, and who can neither read nor write. That fact should at least attract some attention on the part of this great assembly. No one can turn to the statistics embraced in the ninth census and see the illiteracy prevailing not only in Southern States, but in Eastern States and Western States, without recognizing the importance of providing some measure of remedy to do away with the vast evil stalking in the land in consequence of this vast ignorance of some portions of the people.

I regard the pending measure, Mr. Chairman, as of vital importance. Day after day we listen to the objections urged against a particular class of people who have been a disturbing element in the Union ever since emancipation took place. I desire, if possible, at this time to be regarded as non-partisan. If you please, cut me loose from the republican party and from the democratic party, from both parties, and let me stand here only in vindication of a great principle, and in behalf of the rights of five million people whose voice is seldom heard in the halls of legislation. The education of the nation is paramount, and should not be neglected. We should recognize the absolute necessity of elevating our citizens of whatever class or condition from ignorance, from degradation, from superstition, from pauperism, from crime. It is an accepted axiom, I believe everywhere, that the more intelligent the citizen is the better citizen he is.

The objection urged to reconstruction, the objection to the condition of the South by all parties has been, there was such a large amount of dense ignorance. We were told the negro would become an incubus upon the advancing civilization of the age. If to educate the citizen is to make him more intelligent, and thereby more able to discharge the duties of a citizen of this Republic, then it must be apparent to every gentleman upon this floor, it must be apparent to the whole country, it is time some measure should be devised to supply this great want of education on the part of certain classes in the country, in order that all should be elevated to the level where they can better discharge the rights of suffrage conferred upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. CAIN. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that a nation which educates its people is on the sure road to become powerful and great. It has been alleged on the floor in opposition to this bill that if we pass this bill the greater proportion of illiteracy in the South will be found to exist on the part of the colored population. I think if you refer to statistics you will reach a different result. For illustration, let us refer to those statistics in order to bring this matter practically to the attention of the House. If you run your eye down the long lines of figures in the ninth census you will see that not alone is illiteracy confined to the emancipated colored people, but it pervades to a great extent the white people of the South. For instance, here is the great State of Louisiana. By the ninth census I find the number of illiterate people in that State to be as follows: Blacks who cannot read, 11,076; whites who cannot read, 30,183. [Laughter and applause.]

If you take the State of Maryland, you will find the same thing. The number of those who are illiterate whites who cannot read is 97,661; that is, those who cannot; and blacks, 7,674. So I might go on. Here is Mississippi as another illustration, and I want to go into those States where they do business in their own style. [Laughter.] Take, for instance, Mississippi, and we find Mississippi has 5,38[illegible] negroes who cannot read or write, and 33,403 whites who cannot read. [Laughter.] Take Alabama—92,059 whites who cannot read; but the proportion who neither read nor write is very much larger.

Sir, we need education all over this country, and especially in Mississippi and Louisiana and South Carolina. We have in the State which I have the honor in part to represent 480,000 colored people and over 270,000 white people; and if you take the illiteracy of that State you will find a very great difference. I take my own State as an illustration. [Here the hammer fell.] I am looking for the figures, that I may give them accurately, so as not to misrepresent the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] is recognized.

Mr. HASKELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina be allowed to read the figures from the table before him.

Mr. CAIN. If my time has expired, I ask consent to print the remainder of my remarks.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed. I am sure no one will object.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no power in the committee to extend the time.

Leave was given to Mr. CAIN to print the remainder of his remarks. They are as follows:

SKETCHES FROM THE REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION—FACTS FROM THE UNITED STATES CENSUS.

Population.—In 1870, Alabama was the sixteenth State in population, having 996,992 inhabitants, 521,384 whites, 475,510 negroes. Of the natives, residents of the State, there were 369,635 whites, 374,418 blacks.

The school attendance.—According to table 9, volume 1 of Census Report, 77,139 persons of all ages attended school in the State in 1870, there being only 48 foreign born. The white male scholars numbered 31,098, and the white female scholars, 30,226; the colored male, 7,502, and the colored female scholars, 8,313.

Illiterates.—The number of persons of all races, ten years old and over, unable to write, was 383,012, of whom only 870 were foreign-born.

Age, sex, and race of illiterates.—Of the white illiterates ten to fifteen years old, 13,214 were males and 11,016 were females; of those from fifteen to twenty-one years old, 9,642 were males and 9,757 were females; of those twenty-one years old and over, 17,429 were males and 31,001 were females; of the colored illiterates ten to fifteen years old, 24,391 were males and 22,615 females; of those fifteen to twenty-one years old, 25,616 were males and 28,915 were females; of those twenty-one years old and over, 91,017 were males and 98,344 were females.

Educational institutions, amount and source of educational income.—The total income of all the educational institutions was $976,351, of which $39,500 were derived from endowments; $471,161 from taxation and public funds; and $174,470 from other sources, including tuition. Eight colleges reported, containing 1,026 pupils, and had a total income of $108,800; forty-six academies with an income of $142,750 from tuition; none of which was appropriated to the education of negroes; also, the income appertaining to the public—normal, high, grammar, graded and ungraded—common schools, for educating 67,263 pupils, was $629,626; of which $8,000 was derived from endowments, $447,156 from taxation and public funds, and $174,470 from other sources including tuition, none of which was appropriated to colored schools.

GENERAL SKETCHES OF EDUCATION IN DIFFERENT STATES.

North Carolina has lost prestige generally, educationally, the Legislature last winter having removed the clerical force of the superintendent and reduced his salary, thus leaving the office with little capacity for hopeful and vigorous action. The severe proscription of colored people in the State has greatly discouraged their efforts for themselves. The bright spot is Wilmington; the colored schools in that city have been well attended and efficient. Of the schools of South Carolina very little favorable can be said. The friends of education struggle against overwhelming odds. In Charleston the schools are closed for months before the usual time for want of funds. In Georgia the colored people have hardly been permitted to do what they would for themselves freely. Kentucky is very far from establishing a sufficiently efficient system of schools for the education of the whites, and apparently refuses to recognize the desirableness or necessity of the education of the colored children. In Tennessee the colored people are most emphatic in the statement of the difficulties encountered by them in their efforts to educate their children. In Mobile, Alabama, in spite of great difficulties, the colored people are making great progress. While the Swayne School at Montgomery and the Emerson Institute at Mobile and other institutions in the State are doing good service for the colored people of the State, yet in other counties they encounter great difficulties, or it is impossible for them to secure any school privileges.

Education—Arkansas.

It is estimated that there are at least two hundred and fifty deaf mutes in this State under thirty years of age. There is also a large number of colored deaf mutes in the State, entitled to the same privileges of education as the white, for whom no provision has been made, and with the present accommodations of the institute it is impossible to receive them. There are no hospital accommodations, and should an epidemic break out, there is no place to which the sick can be removed.

The population.—In 1870 Arkansas was the twenty-sixth State in population, having 485,471 inhabitants, consisting of 362,115 whites, 122,169 negroes. Native residents of the State: whites, 170,398; blacks, 62,463.

School Attendance.—According to table 9, volume 1 of Census Report, 62,562 persons of all ages attended school in the State in 1870; of these only 26 were foreign born. The white male scholars numbered 30,138; the white female scholars, 26,650. The colored male scholars numbered 2,920, and the colored female, 2,584.

Illiterates.—The number of persons of all races unable to write was 133,339. White illiterates: males, 7,985, and 6,814 females. Of the colored illiterates 5,352 were males, and 4,982 were females.

Educational Institutions.—According to table 12, volume 1 of Census Report, the total number of educational institutions was 1,978; these had 1,653 male, and 644 female teachers; and 41,939 male, and 39,587 female pupils. The public institutions numbered 1,744, with 1,458 male, and 508 female teachers; 37,103 male, and 34,942 female scholars. No division is stated as to races. The total income of all the educational institutions $681,962, of which $7,300 were derived from endowments, $555,331 from taxation and public funds, and $119,331 from tuition and other sources. No division mentioned in this statement in reference to races. The total income appertaining to the public schools was $552,461. Three colleges reported contained 235 pupils, with an income of $7,700; academies (thirty) with 2,144, an income of $25,387. (Nothing said in reference to races.)

EDUCATION OF COLORED CHILDREN.

In Kentucky, the superintendent declares himself uncompromisingly opposed to mixed schools, or to any invasion of the school fund raised by the taxation of the whites; but he favors the inauguration of a separate system, supported by taxes ad valorem and poll, imposed upon the colored people themselves. It is to be regretted the dominant feeling of our legislative sentiment is adverse to the policy of educating the colored population, even though they have petitioned for nothing more than a modified and practical law to be taxed themselves independently for the education of their own children. Surely no one can object to a policy of such simple justice and humanity, unless the prejudice of race has seared and blunted his sensibilities beyond the touch of sympathy. Freed and turned loose among us after a life-time of abject and arbitrary servitude, they must in some way be digested and assimilated as an active and real element in the body-politic. From the necessities of the past and from causes uncontrollable, they are but partially civilized in our midst and can hope to do but little toward materially improving the adult colored population of to-day; but do any want the next generation to be of the the same class and character? Is it to the interest or pride of any citizen that we should foster and perpetuate from generation to generation a barbarous element in our civilized society? But this result is inevitable, unless provision is made to guarantee education to the growing generation. Common schools for the colored population are the only agencies through which there is the remotest hope of qualifying them for higher spheres of action and duties in our political and industrial system for the future. They have never failed with any people as yet, when rightly applied; they will not with any people who are teachable. Let us give the negro honest trial. The Legislature last winter passed the following act:

An act to repeal an act entitled "An act for the benefit of the negroes and mulattoes of this Commonwealth," approved March 9, 1867.

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That an act entitled "An act for the benefit of the negroes and mulattoes of this Commonwealth," approved March 9, 1867, be and the same is repealed.

2. That the same tax per capita and the same rate of taxation on real and personal estate (except taxes for common-school purposes) should be collected of all the negroes and mulattoes in this Commonwealth as of the white population and no other.

3. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

In Georgia.

The subject of schools for colored children in the city has long excited the interest of the board, but as the State has as yet contributed no funds to the county for educational purposes the board has been utterly unable to accomplish anything in this direction. According to table 9, volume 1, of Census Report, 77,495 persons attended school, and of these 143 were foreign-born. The white scholars numbered 67,142; the colored scholars numbered 10,351, of whom 4,898 were males and 5,453 females. The number of inhabitants of all races unable to write was 468,593, of whom 1,090 were foreign-born. Of 343,637 colored illiterates reported, 64,617 were from ten to fifteen years old, and of these 33,364 were males and 31,813 were females. There are no colored schools in Georgia except in Thomasville, Quitman, Savannah, Bainbridge, and one school in Liberty County. These are all under the care of the American Missionary Association.

In Delaware.

Twenty-one teachers were employed, all females except one, and all colored except the principal of the Howard School, Wilmington.

Number of schools.

In the month of January, 1872, the total enrollment in all our schools was 984 and the average attendance 858. Of the total enrollment 824 were reading and spelling, 756 writing, 445 studying arithmetic, 445 studying geography, grammar 63, and only 160 were in the alphabet and primer. Estimating the changes which have occurred in our rolls, we find that about 1,500 different pupils have been taught in our schools the past year. Of this number about two-thirds were males, and nearly one-half were over sixteen years of age. Except in a single case the actuary has visited each school at least once during the term. Those most convenient have been seen more frequently. The amount collected and expended by the colored people for the board and salaries of teachers and the purchase of school-books has been about $2,400, which does not include incidental expenses of fuel, repairs on school-houses, &c., the total expenditure for the year in the prosecution of the work being over $5,000.

Increased interest in schools as shown by colored people.

The colored people have manifested an increased willingness and ability to assist in the support of their schools, the amounts voluntarily contributed by them toward the salaries of teachers having shown a gradual increase. At the commencement of the association's labors in 1867 they paid nothing toward salaries and in some cases not the teachers' board. They now, in all cases, pay the board and a part of the salary, their contributions having risen from a range of $6 to $9 per school per month in 1870–'71 to a present range of $6 to $15. Throughout the State there is a marked decrease of unfriendliness toward our work exhibited by the white people. This is evident from the more friendly feeling manifested toward our teachers and by an increased disposition to assist the colored people in securing their portion of the funds necessary.

Area and population: In 1870 Delaware was the thirty-fourth State in population, having 125,015 inhabitants within an area of 2,120 square miles, an average of 58.97 persons to the square mile. This population consisted of 102,221 whites and 22,794 colored. Of the native residents of the State 74,540 white and 20,214 colored persons were born within its borders; while of the foreign residents 1,142 were born in Germany, 1,421 in England, and 5,907 in Ireland.

SCHOOL ATTENDANCE.

According to table 9, volume 1 of Census Report, 19,965 persons attended school, and of these 205 were foreign-born. The white male scholars numbered 9,862, and the female 8,908; an aggregate of 18,770 white scholars. The colored male scholars were 663, and the female 532; an aggregate of 1,195.

PAUPERISM AND CRIMINALS.

The paupers reported in Alabama numbered 687, of whom 354 were native whites, 327 native blacks, and 6 foreigners. Criminals: Of the 593 prisoners, 149 were native whites, 436 native blacks.

Pauperism in Arkansas.—The paupers numbered 538, of whom 288 were native whites, 202 native colored, and 48 foreigners. Criminals: Of the 362 prisoners reported, 137 were native whites, 184 native colored, and 40 foreigners.

Pauperism in Georgia.—There were 1,816 paupers reported, of whom 1,270 were native whites, 507 native colored, and 39 foreigners. Crime: Of 757 persons in prison, 126 were native whites, 597 native colored, and 14 foreigners, 1,775 persons having been convicted during the year.

RELATION BETWEEN CRIME AND EDUCATION.

The statements following give partial returns from seventeen States, all of them but three from the Middle and the Western States. The aggregates in regard to education sum up as follows, namely:

Aggregate of prisoners	110,538
Aggregate of whites	91,427
Aggregate of blacks	6,296
Aggregate of foreign-born	57,824
Aggregate of native-born	41,942
Aggregate of those who can read and write	82,812
Aggregate of those who can read only	5,931
Aggregate of those who have no education	21,650

In regard to the above aggregate facts it may be observed, first, that the whole number of those who can "read only" is described in the reports as in fact "very ignorant." To have learned to spell out words and read a little gives no real knowledge. Secondly, that the prison reports almost uniformly speak of the great number of those who can read and write as very deficient in education. The general conclusion is that the great mass of prisoners is very ignorant. In the meanwhile the general conclusions of the aggregates above, including the observations of the prison-keepers, are as follows:

The totally ignorant, as shown by those having no education, are 22 per cent. The totally ignorant and very ignorant 25 per cent. The very deficient, including these and a large share of those who can read and write, 50 per cent. In the majority of cases in crime it is shown beyond doubt or controversy that ignorance is one great cause of crime, and that in elevating the education of society, both religious and intellectual, we advance the interest of society by diminishing crime. Just so far, therefore, as society neglects to educate the people just so far does it prepare the crime which the criminal commits. Let us now examine our statistics in detail in regard to color, nativity, and religious education. In regard to sections of the country, taking the State prisons and jails of New York and Pennsylvania (deducting the metropolitan police reports) as representatives of the Middle States, we have these results, namely:

Aggregate number	12,772
Aggregate number of whites	11,268
Aggregate number of colored	1,465
Aggregate number of foreign-born	4,658
Aggregate number of native-born	8,003
Aggregate number of those who can read and write	8,501
Aggregate number of those who can read only	1,774
Aggregate number of those who have no education	2,360

The proportions are:

Totally ignorant, 19 per cent.; totally and very ignorant, 33 per cent.; very deficient, at least 60 per cent.

Let us now take the prisons and jails of the Central Northwest, which includes the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Here we have the statistics of thirty penitentiaries, workhouses, and jails, a sufficient number and variety to give a complete view of the subject in those States. The results are as follows, namely:

Aggregate number	18,931
Aggregate number of whites	14,362
Aggregate number of colored	1,524
Aggregate number of foreign-born	4,078
Aggregate number of native-born	4,851
Aggregate number of those who can read and write	8,722
Aggregate number of those who can read only	935
Aggregate number of those who have no education	6,565

The proportions are:

Totally ignorant	40 per cent.
Totally and very ignorant	46 per cent.
The very deficient, at least	75 per cent.

Let us now take the States west of the Mississippi to the Pacific. Of these we have the reports of four State prisons. In the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, and California the results are:

General aggregate	1,957
General aggregate of whites	1,187
General aggregate of colored	205
General aggregate of foreign-born	503
General aggregate of native-born	696
General aggregate of those who can read and write	1,333
General aggregate of those who can read only	221
General aggregate of those who have no education	403

The proportions are—

Totally ignorant	21 per cent.
Totally and very ignorant	31 per cent.
The very deficient, at least	50 per cent.

Now let us take the only States that we have of those formerly slave States, where the negro population prevails, namely, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, South Carolina. In these States the results are:

Aggregate number of prisoners	4,087
Aggregate number of whites	1,997
Aggregate number of colored	2,090
Aggregate number of foreign-born	267
Aggregate number of native-born	3,485
Aggregate number of those who can read and write	965
Aggregate number of those who cannot read and write	1,435

The States of Georgia and Tennessee, having 1,124 prisoners, made no return of the state of education, and were otherwise defective. In the 2,400 returned the following are the proportions of educated and uneducated, namely, totally ignorant, 60 per cent; very deficient, fully 85 per cent. Thus we see that in the midst of the South, where the colored population is almost totally ignorant, we have the first approach in the United States to the educational condition of France in 1832 and of much of Europe now. Comparing the several sections of the country as presented in the above tables, and including those that can read only (and that is usually very little) among the totally ignorant, we have these proportions. Those called very deficient are put down in a low estimate made from universal testimony of prison-keepers: Totally ignorant, very deficient, in New York and Pennsylvania, 33 per cent. to 60 per cent.; Central Northwest, 46 per cent. to 75 per cent.; West and Pacific, 31 per cent. to 50 per cent.; the South, 60 per cent. to 85 per cent. The returns from the "West and Pacific" are deficient, and, therefore, not a fair test. This and the fact that the great body of miners are really intelligent men make the reasons why that section seems to have less ignorance among criminals.

Proportion of criminals to illiterate population in regard to education.

Here we come to test-facts in regard to the influence of ignorance in producing crime. If the proportion of ignorant criminals to the whole number should prove greatly above that of the illiterate to the whole population it will be a fact conclusive that ignorance is one great cause of crime. Fortunately the returns of education and illiteracy embodied in the census of 1870 will enable us to examine this question and obtain reliable results. Taking the returns of the census of 1870, in connection with the tables I have above given, we have the proportions below, premising, however, that as all prisoners are above ten years of age, so we have taken from the illiterate in the census only those above ten years of age: Illiterate criminals in New York and Pennsylvania, 4 per cent. to 33 per cent.; in Central West, 3½ per cent. to 46 per cent.; in West and Pacific, 3 per cent. to 31 per cent.; in the South, 22 per cent. to 60 per cent. It appears, therefore, that in the Middle States the proportion of illiterate criminals is eightfold the proportion of illiterate people; in the Central West it is thirteen-fold; and in the West and Pacific States it is tenfold. In the South it is only threefold: but this is caused by the great mass of colored people, who make up a large portion of the whole people and, being nine-tenths wholly ignorant, furnish the great mass of criminals. When the still larger white population is counted in it makes the disproportion of the illiterate criminals less; as to colored people only it is very great; but we see in the above proportions the great fact that ignorance is one of the great causes of crime. I do not seek to exaggerate that fact. The figures I give show it in its naked deformity, and I leave the fact to the contemplation of my hearers. But in the mean time let us look at how this fact will operate in an intelligent American community. Let us see exactly how it will operate in New York or Pennsylvania. Let us take ten thousand people as the unit of measure, the result will be, according to the above proportions—

People	10,000
Illiterate	400
Estimated prisoners	40
Prisoners illiterate	35
Others	5

The "others" means only a very common education. What, then, is the practical result? That because 400 persons out of 10,000 have been kept totally ignorant the county or municipality has seven times as many criminals as it need have and seven times as much expense and evil of all kinds resulting from it. Having thus established certain general principles by the incontrovertible testimony of statistics it will not be inconsequential or uninteresting to give the testimony of some of those who are engaged in the actual management of prisons.

The following statement, made by the superintendent of the Detroit house of correction, gives the general facts and causes of crime nearly as correctly as can be obtained from the general averages of the most extended table of statistics: Of the 8,744 prisoners 44 per cent. were under 30 years of age; 60 per cent. acknowledged themselves habitually intemperate; 65 per cent. were living out of the family relation; only 57 per cent. claimed to be able to read and write, 43 per cent. acknowledging themselves without any education at all.

No one can read the above and not conclude that there is a great need of some great national effort to stay the flood of ignorance and crime which is now sweeping over our land. Is it any wonder that the daily papers teem with accounts of murders, cold-blooded, in the Northern and of red-handed kukluxing and night-ridings in the Southern States when the better natures of mankind are undeveloped?

Sir, this state of things calls loudly upon the wise statesmen of our country to stand forth above and beyond the narrow partisan boundaries which have actuated their legislation.

The country needs some new element of strength to awaken new energies of a higher moral sentiment in this nation. This Government can do no greater deed than to dedicate a part of the revenues accruing from the sale of public lands to the education of the people. There are millions of the citizens of this Republic who will not receive that education which every one ought to have to make them worthy citizens unless the Government shall secure it to them. This should not be left entirely to the States, because they will not fully do this work.

I take the higher ground that every child of this Republic should be compelled to attend school at the age of five, and remain till it shall have obtained a liberal education, qualifying it to know the duties of common life. Education in the South will be more effective than a standing army. Educate the masses of the people, and you open up the means for their higher and grander development; you find a panacea for the ills of the South; you lift the dark cloud from the enfranchised millions and establish peace and good-will among the people; you make all classes better citizens, and give new life to enterprises, quickening the latent energies which await the touch of a quickening hand to make them useful to the nation. With an educated peasantry you secure tranquillity to the country, security to property and life, with all the accumulating grandeur of a great, prosperous, free, happy, and contented people. No North, no South, no East, no West, no race antagonisms, but a united nation, respected at home and honored by all the nations of the earth.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I not only believe that every inch of the public domain of this Government belongs to the people of the country, but I also believe that famine should be provided for before you erect school-houses. I say FAMINE! Every dollar that you take from the National Treasury under the pretext of railroads or institutions of learning is so much taken from that fund which should give comfort and repose to the toiling men of this land.

It is therefore an act of gross injustice. It puts class before the general welfare, and leaves the helpless in destitution and places the favored ones in high positions.

I am not narrow in my views about education. I would go as far as any man who occupies a seat upon this floor to protect and advance education. But, sir, when I see the distress there is in this country at this time, I say it becomes us all to look to general measures of relief before we talk about future advancement in education and the erection of colleges and seminaries of learning. As a gentleman beside me [Mr. SPARKS] remarks, "we should provide for the stomach before the head." That is as true a sentiment as was ever uttered. It is the noblest charity.

It may be all well enough to talk of what may be done at another time and upon a future occasion; but if there ever was a time in the history of this country when the wisdom of Congress should be concentrated upon a single point, that time is now, this moment; and that single point is the relief of your suffering millions. Why not do something for the relief of the laboring-man out of employment? Not that he and his dependent family may prosper, but live. Life is what the unemployed men of the land ask you in humiliating prayer to sustain. You reply, educate. Educate! Sore is the school of adversity in which the laboring-men of the land are being instructed. God help them; there is no hope that Congress will.

I do not consent that a dollar shall be taken from the National Treasury for any purpose whatever so long as you have hungry men, women, and children thronging your streets and thoroughfares. Your penitentiaries—yes, sir, and your mad-houses—are full. In the State of Pennsylvania to-day there are five thousand people confined in lunatic asylums, driven there from madness caused by starvation. This takes them there. [Laughter.] Yes, sir, want and destitution. You laugh—it is the same laugh that issues from the cell of the madman, with his wild eyes glaring from behind the bars. Had you not better exchange places? Laugh again! You are in ease; they in the depths of misery. You talk about taking money from the National Treasury to build up institutions of learning, when want everywhere is depicted on the faces of the toiling men of the land. You may laugh about the lunatic asylums of Pennsylvania if you please; but perhaps if some of you who are here were there, it would be better for the welfare of the nation. You might fill their place with more credit to yourselves than the seats you occupy. [Laughter.] Vote your money for class, and let the laboring poor fight the great battle of human existence as best they may; if they gain the victory in sustaining life, dear life, they will not be your debtor.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GOODE. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to limit debate.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOOKER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3542) to apply the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the education of the people, &c., and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill to apply the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the education of the people; and pending that, I move that debate on the amendments which may be offered be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order that debate can only be limited on the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto.

Mr. SPARKS. Let us not stifle discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read a portion of Rule 60.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or at their election upon the pending amendments only.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also read Rule 104.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting without debate on all amendments pending and that may be offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the practice has been to limit debate only on the pending proposition.

Mr. GOODE. Then I move that debate be limited to one minute on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reminds the House that there is an evening session to-night and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELLSWORTH] moves that the House now take a recess.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. What is the business assigned for consideration to-night.

The SPEAKER. It is the bill reported by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL,] from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, providing for the classification of mail matter and the rates of postage thereon. The Chair will state that if the House takes a recess now that will be quite injurious to the consideration of the pending bill in charge of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.]

Mr. CASWELL. I wish to inquire whether any other business will be in order at the evening session except the bill of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. No other business will be in order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ELLSWORTH, there were—ayes 94, noes 64.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result of the vote, the Chair desires to recognize the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] who rises to make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I give notice that I will call up this bill for consideration immediately after the disposal of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. PAGE. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5655) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1878;

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. CARLISLE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

CLASSIFICATION OF MAIL MATTER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House, the session of this evening is for the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, providing for the classification of mail matter and the rates of postage thereon.

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Before the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] commences his remarks, I would like to find out, if possible, if some arrangement cannot be made as to how long general debate shall continue upon this bill. I would suggest that by general consent the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WADDELL. A reference to the proceedings in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show that the motion I made to assign this bill as the special order for this evening was that its consideration should take place in the House, not in Committee of the Whole, nor in the House as in Committee of the Whole. But I will say to my friend and colleague on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. CANNON, of Illinois] that I have no disposition whatever to throw any obstacle in the way of the fullest and freest discussion of this measure, or of any amendment that any gentleman, either a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads or any other member of the House, may desire to offer to the bill.

If any member of the House can offer an amendment which will add anything to the efficiency of the provisions of the bill as they have been considered, not only by the Post-Office Department and by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House, but also by the publishers of the country, so far from objecting to it I shall be most happy to receive it. I am perfectly willing to agree to any proposition of that sort coming from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

I would like to have this bill considered with all due rapidity; I will not say haste, and perhaps I ought not to say rapidity. But I want the bill considered and disposed of as quickly as it can be with regard to thorough consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to be that a certain time be allowed for general debate on this bill, with the understanding that at the expiration of that time the bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, with a view to taking it up by sections for amendment.

Mr. WADDELL. What time does the gentleman from Illinois desire?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think that a bill of this character should have full time for its consideration. I do not know how much time the gentleman in charge of the bill desires. I would like myself from twenty to thirty minutes; thirty at the outside, and possibly not more than twenty, by way of general debate.

Mr. WADDELL. I would be very happy to have the gentleman take half an hour if he desires. I do not myself desire to take up much time, but I will accede to any proposition the gentleman may make.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. What does the gentleman say, then, to having general debate limited to one hour and then at the end of that time allowing the bill to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

Mr. WADDELL. I have no objection to an arrangement of that kind.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the Chair please state just what the proposed arrangement is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was about to do so. It is proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] and, as the Chair understands, agreed to by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL,] the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, that general debate on this bill shall continue for one hour; and that at the expiration of that time the bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole by sections under the five-minute rule. Is there objection to that arrangement?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WADDELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to offer as a substitute for the bill on the Calendar (which is House bill No. 3850, providing for the classification of mail matter and the rates of postage thereon) that which I send to the Clerk's desk and which is in substance House bill No. 5735 of the same title.

This bill has been twice recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and the substitute which I offer is House bill No. 5735 with some modifications. Before the substitute is read I desire to make a general statement in explanation of the proposition of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The need for a reclassification of the matter sent through the mail and for a readjustment of the rates of postage thereon has for a long time been recognized, not only by the Post-Office Department but by the publishers of the country of all classes and by all classes of the people. For several years this matter has been pressed upon the attention of Congress, and the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has for more than a year past desired to effect the necessary changes in the law, but up to the present hour we have been unable to accomplish them.

The bill which we now present for the consideration of the House I believe has received as mature consideration as any proposition which has ever been submitted to Congress. It is approved not only by the Post-Office Department, but by the publishers of the country of all kinds of publications, and it has been carefully considered for the past eighteen months by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House.

More than a year ago, Mr. Speaker, appreciating the necessity for a change in the law, and recognizing the fact that some responsibility rested upon me in connection with this subject as chairman of that committee, I visited the city of New York and invited the leading publishers, not only of quarterly and monthly publications but of daily and weekly publications of all kinds, to meet me in consultation at the office of the postmaster in that city—a gentleman whom I have had occasion heretofore in a report to this House to characterize as the peerless postmaster of New York City.

The result of that conference was to give a new impulse to the movement in favor of postal reform in this country; and it was succeeded by a number of conferences on the part of leading publishers of the country, the outcome of which is contained in the provisions of the bill which I now submit to the House.

Inasmuch as many members of the House, not feeling any special interest in this subject, are not very well informed upon it, (and I am very sorry to see illustrated to-night the fact that night sessions are not generally very favorable to the consideration of legislation,) I would state that under the existing postal regulations all matter sent through the mails is divided into three classes, first, written matter; second, printed matter of a certain kind; and, third, miscellaneous printed matter, which latter class also embraces merchandise.

The first change we propose in the law is to make a reclassification and to divide all mailable matter into four classes: first, written matter; second, periodical publications under registration, (which I will explain in a moment;) third, miscellaneous printed matter; and, fourth, merchandise. Thus we make a radical change in the classification of mail matter. There is no change in the rates of postage on first-class matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. How do the rates of postage upon merchandise, as defined in this bill, compare with the present rates?

Mr. WADDELL. We make no change whatever in that respect. The sum and substance of this substitute is a readjustment and better arrangement of the bill which we had on the Calendar. Our provision with reference to fourth-class matter limits the weight to four pounds, "except in case of single volumes weighing in excess of that amount, and except also for books and documents published or circulated by order of Congress, or official matter emanating from any of the Departments of the Government or from the Smithsonian Institution, or which is not declared non-mailable under the provision of section 3893 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of July 12, 1876"—that is, the provision relating to obscene matter—"or matter appertaining to lotteries, gift-concerts, or fraudulent schemes or devices: provided, that when so requested by the postmaster at the office of mailing, any person presenting matter of the fourth class for mailing shall write upon the package his name and address, preceded by the words 'mailed by.'" Upon this class of matter the rate is one cent an ounce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been objected, and probably will be objected in this debate, that all classes of printed matter are now carried by the Government at a loss; that they do not pay the cost of transportation; and therefore the change we propose ought not to be made. Our proposition is to make a uniform rate for weeklies, dailies, monthlies, and quarterlies, while under the present law dailies and weeklies pay two cents a pound, and monthlies and quarterlies three cents a pound. The objection has been made that there ought not to be an alteration of the law in this respect, because all printed matter is now carried at a loss—does not pay the cost of transportation. Admitting the force of this argument as applicable to all classes of printed matter, and ignoring entirely the argument in favor of the policy of disseminating intelligence among the people even at a pecuniary loss to the postal service, it is to be remembered that these weekly papers weigh in the aggregate at least four times as much as the monthlies and quarterlies do, and that if any discrimination be made at all, it ought to be in favor of the less bulky and therefore less costly class of mail matter. But under existing law (being exactly the reverse of the law applicable to written matter) monthlies and quarterlies are required to pay 50 per cent. more postage than the dailies and the weeklies do. The reason and justice of the case are on the other side entirely.

Let me illustrate. The Harpers publish a monthly magazine, and also two weekly papers—Harper's Bazar and Harper's Weekly. The monthly magazine weighs about nine ounces. Each of the weekly publications weighs about three ounces. These three publications have a circulation of about one hundred thousand copies each. Thus, of the monthlies there are circulated annually about twelve hundred thousand copies, and of the two weekly publications about ten million copies annually. The aggregate weight of the yearly circulation of the monthly is about six hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds, and of the weeklies about eighteen hundred thousand pounds. Yet the monthlies are required to pay 50 per cent. more postage than the weeklies; and this is directly against reason and justice.

I want to say in brief that this bill which we offer as a substitute for the Calendar bill has not only been maturely considered by the Post-Office Department, by all the leading publishers of the country, and by the Post-Office Committee of this House, but it must strike every one who reads its provisions as embracing the fairest and most just arrangement for the classification of mail matter and rates of postage that has ever been presented to the country.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like the gentleman to state what change it makes in the revenue?

Mr. WADDELL. I state in answer to the gentleman from Georgia that the effect of the adoption of this bill——

Mr. BLOUNT. I mean as to the subject you are discussing now, monthly and weekly publications, putting them on the same basis.

Mr. WADDELL. Our idea is as contained in the bill, to make a uniform rate for all class of registered matter; and for fear the term "registered" might be misunderstood, let me say to gentlemen it is not in the sense as applied to registered letters and registered third-class matter as now adopted by the Post-Office Department. But the whole theory of registration as connected with this class of publication was to draw a line of distinction between the legitimate publications and those called illegitimate. The whole effect of the bill, if it is passed, will be at first sight to reduce the revenue $70,000, but the effect after the first year will be to increase the revenue. We are satisfied after the mature deliberation we have given to this measure that it is not only for the benefit of the revenues of the Government, but entirely to the satisfaction of all the publishers of the country. Of course there are individuals who are not satisfied with every provision in it.

Mr. HAYES. I should like to ask the gentleman a question while he is on that point. What is the object to be secured by this registration? If you will give us your idea on that point I will be much obliged.

Mr. WADDELL. The object to be secured by the registration is, as I said a moment ago, to draw more distinctly than has been done heretofore the line between what are called legitimate periodical publications and those which are illegitimate passing through the mails without paying probably any postage.

Mr. HAYES. I see in section 6, in the beginning of that section, these words: "Publishers of newspapers and periodicals, who may desire to have their publications registered through the mails, &c., may have them registered." That includes all publications of newspapers and periodicals, and I do not see where the line of distinction is.

Mr. WADDELL. "Except as hereinafter provided." If the gentleman will finish the reading of the bill he will see it. The difficulty was to get these paragraphs together in proper connection, and that is why we have offered a substitute for the bill on the Calendar. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that section 4 in the bill has been entirely "wiped out" and another section substituted for it.

Mr. HAYES. That is where I made the mistake, I suppose. I have not that section here.

Mr. WADDELL. Perhaps we had better have the bill read by sections, and then I can explain section by section.

Mr. HAYES. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The original bill or the substitute?

Mr. WADDELL. The substitute.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does the gentleman ask the substitute be read for action now?

Mr. WADDELL. I ask the substitute be read by section so I may explain it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. For consideration at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done under the order of the House until after the expiration of one hour. That is, it cannot be read for amendment until after one hour.

Mr. HALE. It might be well to have section 4 read as it is there, as most of us have the House bill No. 5735. I understand the only change is blotting out section 4 and substituting something else for it.

Mr. WADDELL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire to have the whole substitute read?

Mr. WADDELL. I do not. I prefer of course to have it read only by section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be in order after one hour has expired.

Mr. WADDELL. I do not wish the bill read as a whole, and that is the reason I made the motion I did, that the first reading should be dispensed with and that the substitute should be read by sections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be done at the expiration of one hour.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman has closed his remarks I will ask him to yield to me.

Mr. WADDELL. I wish to state before my colleague proceeds that I have not yet finished my general explanation of the provisions of the bill and I only stopped because I supposed the gentleman wished it to be taken up by section.

Mr. HAYES. I hope, then, the gentleman will make his objection now.

Mr. WADDELL. I have only a few more words to say. I have no speech to make. The propositions we make are three: first, a uniformity of rate for all periodical publications of two cents a pound, changing the present law of two and three cents, and making it uniform at two cents a pound.

The next point is to make the rates at all post-offices uniform, because, as my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] will have occasion no doubt to say to the House, there is now a very great distinction between the delivery of mail matter at offices where the free-delivery system exists and at offices where it does not exist. And the third general principle we have presented covers the case of specimen copies of newspapers sent.

I do not know that it is necessary to go into an explanation of all these several provisions, and I might content myself with simply recapitulating and stating to the House that while the present law makes a distinction between daily and weekly newspapers and monthly and quarterly publications that pass through the mails, subjecting the former to a rate of two cents and the latter to a rate of three cents a pound, we propose to make them uniform at the rate of two cents a pound. In the next place we propose to make the rates at all post-offices, free-delivery offices, and all others the same. And in the third place we propose to allow specimen copies to go through at the same rates as those to regular subscribers. I believe that is all I want to say at present.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. This bill has received, as the gentleman in charge of it says, pretty thorough consideration by the committee by whose direction it was reported. It is an effort made, if possible, to distinguish more clearly between different classes of matter that pass through the mails of the United States.

I cannot say, sir, that many sections of the bill in my opinion are an improvement upon the law as it now is. I think that in most respects the postal code is in pretty good shape, and I am not at all clear but that in an effort to produce greater harmony a door may be opened that will produce greater confusion. The law as it now is, to which I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment, is as clear perhaps as language can make it; and this law has been in force since 1874. The practice of the Department is fixed under it; many precedents have been made; postmasters throughout the country and the country are familiar with its provisions; and I want to be assured before we adopt this system of registration that is proposed in this bill that it will be an improvement. So I will call attention very briefly to section 5 of an act passed in 1874 touching this subject, which reads:

> That on and after the 1st of January, 1875, on all newspapers and periodical publications mailed from a known office of publication or news agency, and addressed to regular subscribers, or news agents, postage shall be charged at the following rates: On newspapers and periodical publications, issued weekly and more frequently than once a week, two cents for each pound or fraction thereof; and on those issued less frequently than once a week, three cents per pound or fraction thereof.

Then subsequent sections of this law determine the manner in which the postage shall be paid and prescribe the form of the affidavit which publishers shall make that their publications are sent to genuine subscribers, and so forth. In 1876 an amendment to this act was made marking out very plainly the distinction between a newspaper that goes to regular subscribers and transient papers and advertising sheets. I read from the act of July 12, 1876, a part of section 15:

> That transient newspapers and magazines, regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes or for free circulation or for circulation at nominal rates, and all printed matter of the third class except unsealed circulars shall be admitted to and transmitted in the mails at the rate of one cent for every two ounces or fraction thereof.

So the House will observe that the law as it now is marks out plainly the difference between a newspaper which has a regular list of subscribers and between an advertising sheet which is issued primarily as an advertising sheet and supplied free or at a nominal rate; and I say again I doubt if the English language can make the distinction plainer than it now is made in the law.

This bill now proposes, in section 1, to divide mailable matter instead of into three classes, first, second, and third, into four classes, first, second, third, and fourth. It defines what shall constitute a newspaper, it defines what shall constitute an advertising sheet, it defines the rates proposed, as plainly as they are defined in the law at this time. But for the purpose of having the evidence of the class of publication that shall constitute a newspaper, and that shall go through the mails at these privileged rates, the bill in section 6 provides that the publishers of a newspaper shall register his paper with the postmaster in the United States wherever the paper is published, paying a fee of $1 annually therefor; and when it is examined and ascertained by the postmaster to come within the definition of the law as a regular newspaper, that then the postmaster shall give him a certificate of that fact, and that he shall print the word "registered" on each newspaper that he prints, and that it shall go through the mails at the uniform rate of two cents a pound.

Now it is not provided in this act that each paper so registered shall be sent to the central office, but the bill leaves it, as the law now leaves it for that matter, with each postmaster to determine what paper comes within the definition of the law as proposed to be amended, so that I do not see wherein any more or less discretion is granted to a postmaster than is now granted to him. I do not see where anything is to be gained by the proposed bill and the additional machinery therein provided as a part of the scheme of registration. If a newspaper is not admitted in the mail under the privileged rate, as the law now is, an appeal can be made to the Postmaster-General. The bill provides for practically the same appeal to the Postmaster-General and then provides as follows, (I read from section 6:)

> In case of the refusal by the postmaster to issue a certificate of registration, an appeal may be taken by the publisher to the Postmaster-General and the proprietor of any publication refused registration under this act or in cases where a certificate of registration has been revoked may apply to the district court of the United States in which his office is situated for a mandamus to compel the issue of such registration, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on such court.

That perhaps may be a wise piece of legislation connected with the registration system. I doubt it, however; I would much sooner that the whole bill should fail than that both these provisions in this section should be adopted. This bill is ostensibly reported to secure uniformity. Now, it secures the very opposite, for the reason that any one of the forty thousand postmasters applied to may reject the application and the applicant can resort to the district court in whatever district the office may be situated and apply for a mandamus to compel the postmaster to receive his paper as published. The result is that each district court in the United States has exclusive original jurisdiction without appeal, and it will be seen at once that this will not give uniformity.

I doubt the policy of resorting in the first instance to a court to compel an executive officer belonging to a co-ordinate branch of the Government to do any act of this nature.

Section 9 of the bill provides that all matter of the second class shall go through the mails at a uniform rate—at two cents a pound. I do not believe that that section is right in this, and if the House will give me its attention for a few minutes I will state why.

I hold in my hand a letter of the superintendent of railway mail service, (the late Mr. Bangs,) written in 1875, showing the cash revenues and comparative profit and loss of carrying the different classes of mail matter for the fiscal year 1874; that the letters—first-class matter—weighed in round numbers 13,500,000 pounds, and constituted 12.1 per cent. of all the mail matter carried, and yielded $19,597,000 revenue, while the second-class matter (newspapers and periodicals) weighed 55,783,000 pounds, and constituted 50 per cent. of all mail matter carried, and yielded $976,217. The total postal revenues for that year were $25,213,000, while the total expenditures were $32,126,000. Estimated by weight, the cost of service for carrying second-class matter was $16,063,000; revenue from postage on same, $976,217—cost exceeds revenues $15,087,783.

The proportion of matter of different classes carried and revenues from same is substantially the same now as in 1874, as shown from the Postmaster-General's report.

The Postmaster-General's Report for 1878, page 7, shows that the postage on second-class matter during the last fiscal year was $1,025,180.98; of this on papers published weekly and more frequently at two cents a pound the postage was $817,673.26, while upon papers and periodicals published less frequently than weekly, at three cents a pound, the postage was $207,507.72. Now, this bill lowers the postage on periodicals from three to two cents a pound, and would make the revenues $69,169.24 less than now received. In other words, estimating by weight, here is mail matter that it costs the Government per annum to distribute at the rate of $17,000,000, and yields a revenue by way of postage of $1,000,000, leaving a deficit of $16,000,000; and now it is proposed to further decrease the postage per annum, $69,000. The proposed decrease is in the interest of a few publishers of periodicals. To illustrate, say the weight of the magazines average five ounces per copy, twelve copies per year aggregate in weight sixty ounces, or three and two-thirds pounds; the postage at three cents a pound is eleven cents per annum; the proposed reduction to two cents a pound makes it seven and a half cents per annum. Does any one suppose the price of subscription will be lowered to the reader? If not, the $69,000 per annum goes into the pockets of the publishers of the magazines.

The truth is all of the second-class matter, substantially, is franked through the mails, paying, estimated by weight, only one-seventeenth of its cost. I do not complain, as this is a means for information and education of the people. I only claim that, if we keep the machinery for collecting postage from this class of matter, the rate is now as low as it should be. I am not sure, however, but the time has almost, if not quite, arrived when second-class matter should include strictly newspapers and periodicals as contradistinguished from papers primarily intended for advertising, and let them go in the mails without postage and charge all other matter that passes through the mails the cost of distribution. I am certain that such legislation would vastly increase the revenues of the Post-Office Department.

But as a matter of revenue it is a mere farce to say that you charge postage on this matter, and then turn around with all these facts staring you in the face and further reduce the revenue from this source by $70,000 per annum.

Mr. WADDELL. Will my colleague on the committee allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. WADDELL. My colleague, as I understand, objects to the change proposed by this substitute because it establishes a uniform rate of two cents per pound on all classes of legitimate publications. He says that these publications have now practically the franking privilege; that so far as the expense of transportation is concerned they do not pay it, and therefore it is practically a franking privilege. I now ask my colleague to state to the House if he can give any just or good reason why a monthly or a quarterly publication should pay three cents a pound while a daily or weekly publication should pay two cents a pound, when the aggregate of the daily or weekly amounts to four times as much as that of the quarterly or monthly for the same time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will answer the question to the best of my ability. First as to the matter of revenue when compared with the expenditures which this matter involves, I will say that the rate of postage on both classes is too low, but I apprehend you cannot raise the postage in this country.

Mr. WADDELL. You cannot.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And it is no good argument because two cents a pound is too low and three cents a pound is too low to say you should reduce it all to two cents a pound. That is one reason. Now for another. The newspapers published weekly and more frequently than once a week go to the masses of the people throughout the country, to the poor people, to the laboring people; everybody takes them. It is the exclusive few as a rule who take the monthlies. The same argument would apply in this case that would apply in favor of supporting the common schools at public expense, and not the colleges.

Now, the Postmaster-General does not recommend this legislation proposed in section 9. I desire to call the attention of the House to pages 33 and 34 of his last report, in which he says:

> If the revenues of the postal service were equal to its expenditures, no severe system of economy would be so necessary for its administration. Many of my predecessors have urged the establishment of higher rates of postage or the exclusion from the mails of such matter as did not pay the expenses of its transportation, in order to make the department self-sustaining. Time and again it has been shown that matter of the second and third class does not pay its way through the mails, and Congress has been urged to increase the rates of postage thereon.

And so on.

Mr. WADDELL. Yes: please read "and so on."

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly, I will read the rest of it:

> The question has been considered time and again by the appropriate committees and discussed by both branches of Congress, and the results have shown that it was not expected that the Department should be self-sustaining, but that the deficiencies in its revenues should be met by appropriations from the general Treasury.

Mr. WADDELL. Yes, that is so.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That is enough, I suppose, and it shows what has been the policy of the Department. I need not call the attention of gentlemen again to the fact that the monthlies, magnificent and readable as they are, do not reach the masses of the people who pay these taxes to make up these deficiencies.

Now, there is another objection to this section 9. It contains some more legislation that I do not believe to be judicious. As the law now stands all mail matter of the second class originating at a letter-carrier office cannot be delivered within the delivery of that office except at the rate of one cent per each two ounces or fractions thereof. This section 9 proposes to repeal that provision of law, and to allow matter originating in these offices to be delivered at the rate of two cents a pound through the carriers. Now, sir, I do not believe that is a wise provision.

It has been said on the other side in argument of this question, and no doubt will be said again, that under the law as it now is a newspaper may be mailed in San Francisco to a subscriber in New York, and delivered by the carrier in New York to that subscriber, at the rate of 2 cents per pound, and that it is not good policy to say that a newspaper mailed in New York for a subscriber in New York may not be delivered to that subscriber at the same rate.

Now, that is a pretty strong case. But mind you there are not a great many newspapers delivered in that way. If the whole issue of a paper published in San Francisco, or any very great number of that issue, was sent to the subscribers in New York, then I think that the right to have it delivered at the rate of 2 cents per pound should be curtailed. But the fact is that there are very few of the issues of a paper published in San Francisco delivered to subscribers in New York.

My objection to this modification is, that if you allow the great dailies, or the weeklies, or the tri-weeklies, or the periodicals published in these great letter-carrier cities, to be delivered at the rate of two cents a pound they will burden the carriers so that they cannot deliver promptly letters and other classes of matter, and you will either break down the system or will have to increase it from 50 to 100 per cent.

Let me illustrate. In the city of New York last year there were nine million newspapers—I mean nine million different pieces—delivered by the carriers at the rate of one cent for two ounces and each fraction thereof. Now, suppose you open the mails to the New York papers and periodicals in New York City at the rate of two cents a pound, would it be too much to say that of the morning and evening dailies, the weeklies and the monthlies, the total amount that would be delivered each day through the carrier system would be twenty-five thousand pieces? I think not; I think that estimate quite reasonable. Multiply twenty-five thousand by three hundred and sixty-five and you have ninety-two million pieces to be delivered annually. "But," says somebody, "why not, provided it pays expenses?" There is the rub. These publications now pay the expenses of carrying them in letter-carrier cities because the rate is one cent a paper and sometimes two cents; but this proposition is to deliver these publications at the rate of two cents a pound. To deliver these additional ninety-two million pieces annually you would have to increase your letter-carrier force, in my opinion, at least 50 per cent., with no appreciable increase of revenue.

I do not live in a letter-carrier city; there is none in my district; I have no interest in that system except for the general good of the service. At last this free-delivery system has become self-sustaining; in other words, what is earned in four great cities in excess of the expenditures is more than enough to make up what is lost in the other cities. I ask the House to pause long before taking a step to break down this system which after twelve or fifteen years has been brought to the position of being self-sustaining.

Mr. LATHROP. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. LATHROP. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to a provision contained in the sixth section. The bill there provides for an appeal, in case of refusal of registration, to the Postmaster-General. Then follows this language:

> The proprietor of any publication refused registration under this section, or whose certificate of registration has been revoked under section 7, may, on proper notice, apply to the district court in the district in which the office of publication is situated for a mandamus against the postmaster to compel the allowance of such registration.

I wish to inquire whether the right of application for a mandamus is given to the publisher after his appeal has been made to the Postmaster-General and refused, and whether the mandamus is to be directed to the local postmaster?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I suppose that by a fair construction of the section the right to apply for a mandamus is given after the appeal has been taken to the Postmaster-General; and there can be no question, I take it, from the reading of the section, that the mandamus is to be against the local postmaster. Now, I desire to submit a question to my colleague whether he thinks there is any necessity that the press of the United States, extended and powerful as it is, with its thousands of strong arms reaching out through the country, should be given a remedy which is not given in cases similar in principle to the humblest and poorest private citizen in the United States.

Mr. LATHROP. I supposed that the gentleman, as a member of the committee reporting this bill, would understand what its provisions were intended to reach; and it struck me as exceedingly improper that the local postmaster, after his action had been affirmed by his superior, should be drawn into court at his own expense in a proceeding to compel him to disobey orders.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think the gentleman's criticism is very apt; and in putting my question to him my design was not so much to elicit an answer as to bring out more clearly the provision of this section.

Mr. WADDELL. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I will say to the gentleman who propounded the question [Mr. LATHROP] that the committee, in preparing the paragraph to which he has referred, understood that in case the publisher made an appeal from the local postmaster to the Postmaster-General and was by the latter denied his right, he should be protected in his right to the utmost extremity by allowing him to demand from the court a mandamus compelling the Postmaster-General to admit the publication to registration.

Mr. LATHROP. But no provision is made for protecting the local postmaster in defending the action of the Department.

Mr. WADDELL. The idea of the committee was that only after the publisher had taken an appeal from the local postmaster to the Postmaster-General should the remedy of mandamus against the higher officer, the Postmaster-General, apply, and that the local postmaster would then be exempted from all further responsibility.

Mr. LATHROP. This provision seems to give the right of mandamus not against the Postmaster-General but against the local postmaster.

Mr. WADDELL. The committee may have been unfortunate in their phraseology; but unquestionably their intention was to give the right of mandamus against the Postmaster-General, the officer to whom the appeal is to be made.

Mr. LATHROP. One word more. Is it not very singular to give every district court in the United States jurisdiction over the Postmaster-General; to draw him to Oregon, California, Louisiana, Maine, or Florida—to the extremest parts of the country—to answer in a proceeding of this kind?

Mr. WADDELL. It was only intended out of extreme regard for the publishers of the country. So far from being a neglect of the rights of the humble citizen, as has been said, the intention of the committee was to protect him to the extremest limit of the law in the preservation of his rights by giving him a mandamus. I will frankly say I have no objection to a change in the phraseology, but I may say, speaking for the committee of which I am chairman, our only idea was to protect the publisher in his rights in case injustice has been done, either by the local postmaster or the Postmaster-General.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman whether it is not the fact a mandamus is to issue compelling the postmaster to receive mail matter as registered pending the decision of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WADDELL. That is provided in another section of the bill which has not been discussed, where it is provided he shall enter into bonds to pay third-class rates pending the appeal.

Mr. LATHROP. Is not the matter of mandamus a questionable provision to introduce?

Mr. WADDELL. We do not think so or we would not have put it in the bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will say to my colleague I think it is, and I have been trying to give the reason why I think so.

There are other objections of a minor character to several sections of this bill, which I will not take the time of the House now to discuss, but to which I will call attention as the bill is considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, the object of the Government in establishing a postal service was for the dissemination of useful knowledge for the public good and to promote communication between its citizens in the several sections of the country. I should like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois and gentlemen on that side of the House generally.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, this bill was prepared by officers of the Post-Office Department, and was introduced by me, referred to this committee, has been considered for eighteen months, and has been twice recommitted with amendments, and printed. It has been submitted to a number of conventions of publishers in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and other places. It has met their approval in every instance, and I have on my table now a large number of letters from these publishers, not only of books, but of leading daily journals of the country and postmasters of the leading post-offices of the country, in which they express their approval. My colleague of the committee from Illinois is mistaken when he states the Postmaster-General did not recommend this feature of registration.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I should be pleased if the gentleman would call attention to the recommendation. On the contrary, I read from his report showing he did not ask it—that is for that section of the bill decreasing postage on second-class matter.

Mr. MONEY. I will come to that in a minute. The object of this bill is simply to secure three or four more desirable things in order to promote the efficiency of the postal service—first, uniformity; second, simplicity; and third, justice to the different publishers. In this question of registration which has engaged the attention of the publishers who have considered the bill at all there was once an objection made by the convention of Philadelphia publishers which was afterward withdrawn. My friend from Illinois states it does not secure a uniformity of decision on these points. He is certainly mistaken about it. I think I can show it clearly to the House. As the law now stands every postmaster in the United States passes his judgment upon the paper applying for registration, not only the postmaster who mailed the paper but every postmaster in the United States to whose office the paper comes in the course of delivery. The object of this bill is to take from postmasters receiving this paper the rate of second judgment on the publisher. In other words, when a publisher is admitted to registration under the bill as contemplated in this section, the postmaster receiving that paper must deliver it. You can imagine very readily the embarrassment which attends the publisher of a journal having a large circulation. He applies to the postmaster at the office of publication, and he admits his paper to the mail as coming within the limits prescribed by the law. It is carried through the mail all over the United States. Probably ten thousand postmasters will receive it and deliver it to subscribers, while ten thousand more will put their judgment in opposition to the office of publication and refuse to deliver it. There is a conflict at once, and before it can be settled by reference to the proper office in the Post-Office Department, the publisher is under the embarrassment of having half of the edition refused to subscribers.

That at least is one of the difficulties obviated by the bill under consideration, and I think it is important enough to warrant the adoption of the bill by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour has expired.

Mr. MONEY. I will now speak in my own right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. General debate was limited by the House to one hour, after which the bill was to be read by sections under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope there will be unanimous consent to the gentleman's proceeding.

There was no objection, and Mr. MONEY's time was extended.

Mr. MONEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, in this matter of reducing the postage on periodicals published less frequently than once a week, the law as it exists to-day is not only illogical, but absurd; and not only absurd, but foolish; and more than that, it is unjust. As I stated in the outset of my remarks, the object of the establishment of the postal service is for the dissemination of useful knowledge among the people and to promote private correspondence. This being the object, we ought to adopt those means and appliances which will best subserve that end. The Post-Office Department, looked at in that light, may be considered as a great educator of the people in all parts of the country. Now that class of publications which is least entitled to be called an educator is admitted to the most privileged rates; and that highest class of literature, in which are ranked all the monthly, bimonthly, and quarterly publications, is excluded from the privileged rate, although they are in their very nature the highest educators that reach the people in that way. Take, for instance, the Missionary Herald, the oldest monthly in the United States, with over one hundred thousand subscribers. From the fact that that journal is published monthly it is compelled to pay the extraordinary rate of three cents a pound. Take all the monthlies of the country, and I say if you examine the character of those monthlies you will find more than two-thirds of the monthlies of this country are not the mere vehicles of literature to the people, but are instructors in the highest sense of the term. You may take every school-teacher's journal in the country; you may take every engineer's journal; you may take every law journal, and every medical journal, and every religious journal, and almost all the agricultural and live-stock journals of the country, including those referring to bee culture and other special industries in which the people are interested—they all come within this class, and are compelled to pay the extraordinary rate of three cents a pound.

Now, I ask, considering the fact that the Post-Office Department is to disseminate useful information, do you not see this law as it exists to-day and in the manner in which it is to be remedied by this bill is not only unjust, but absurd? It is absolutely cheating the people out of the advantage which the law proposed to give them by reducing the rate on publications.

That point cannot be gainsaid, for there is no dispute about that in the world that every journal in this country, almost without exception, that can be called an instructor and educator is to-day cut out from the privileged rate and is transmitted at the higher rate, while the mass of ephemeral dailies that furnish the gossip and the scandal of the hour are admitted at the privileged rate. I have nothing to say against the daily journals, because we could not exist without the morning paper; I am an editor myself; that is my profession, and I have a friendly feeling toward all the craft.

The reduction of revenue by this change in postage on that class of publications is estimated at about $70,000. Now, to promote the efficiency of the service we must simplify its operations as much as possible; and in simplifying the operations you always reduce the expense; you cannot help it.

Let me say another thing. Is it worth while for a country like this, that has undertaken to carry the mail and the correspondence of its citizens without compensation—for it has never been proposed to make the post-office a source of revenue—is it becoming in a great nation like this, which has voluntarily assumed this duty for its people, its citizens, to sacrifice the great principles of justice and uniformity for the paltry sum of $70,000? But, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee, that would be only for the first year; and after a while the machinery of the post-office would get into such a position that it would not be open to the objections made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The gentleman from Illinois made the objection, also, that this bill provides for cutting down the rates in the cities of free delivery. I can show the House, in one sentence, that in that respect the law as it stands now is a more palpable absurdity than it is in the respect I have just explained. In the first place, the objection my colleague raised as to the duties of the letter-carriers being increased cannot hold good, for he will remember it was the testimony of the representative of every daily paper that came before our committee that they did not trust their paper to the hands of the post-office at all; because the demand for the daily paper must be met promptly. I do not want my daily paper unless I get it at my breakfast-table. It is put in the hands of newspaper-carriers; it does not go through the post-office; so that the gentleman's argument falls to the ground.

Now, here is the absurdity. As the law now stands, I publish a paper in New York or Boston or any other great center of population. I cannot have that paper delivered to a solitary subscriber in the city of publication by a letter-carrier without paying a double rate of postage; but I can send that paper three thousand miles away and at the end of that route I can put it in the hands of a letter-carrier and have it delivered free in Portland or San Francisco.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Did it appear in the testimony before the committee as a fact that that course was pursued by publishers of newspapers?

Mr. MONEY. It did.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Then I understand as a fact that newspaper publishers are in the habit of sending their newspapers a distance of three thousand miles in order to get them at the end of the route into a post-office.

Mr. MONEY. No, sir; the gentleman has misunderstood me. Perhaps I was unfortunate in making myself understood. As the law now stands the publisher of a newspaper at Boston or Washington can send his paper through the mails to a point at a distance of three thousand miles. There it is put in the hands of the letter-carriers and they deliver it free, the charge of transmission being two cents a pound. But he cannot deliver it free in his own town by a letter-carrier without being subjected to the same expense. In other words, the Government undertakes to carry it three thousand miles, and then delivers it free; but refuses to deliver it free in the city of publication without a charge for transportation the same as for the three thousand miles. Now, that absurdity shows itself at once to every mind that considers the question at all.

Mr. DEERING. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MONEY. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DEERING. My question relates to section 4 of the bill. Under existing law, Mr. Speaker, postmasters are required to forward letters for one full rate——

Mr. MONEY. If the gentleman will allow me to anticipate him, I will say that we have amended that section. We have stricken out that section in the printed bill and offer an amendment which meets the objection which the gentleman was about to urge.

Mr. DEERING. Where is that amendment?

Mr. MONEY. It is here in the bill which has been substituted. It will be read when we get to consider the bill by sections. I will now read that amendment to section 4. It is as follows:

That all mail matter of the first-class upon which one full rate of postage has been prepaid, shall be forwarded to its destination charged with the unpaid rate, to be collected on delivery—

As at present—

but postmasters before delivering the same or any article of mail matter upon which prepayment in full has not been made, shall affix or cause to be affixed and canceled as ordinary stamps are canceled one or more stamps equivalent in value to the amount of postage due on such article of mail matter, which stamps shall be of such special design and denomination as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, and which shall in no case be sold by any postmaster or received by him in prepayment of postage. That in view of the commission now allowed to postmasters at offices of the fourth-class, &c.

In other words, the bill as amended allows the same liberty in forwarding matter that has received only part of the postage necessary, but provides, by the affixing of a special stamp, for the collection of the overdue postage.

Mr. DEERING. Then, as I understand, the letter is to be forwarded and the deficit collected.

Mr. WADDELL. Yes; by special stamps.

Mr. MONEY. Let me revert now to this registration matter again. There is this easy avoidance of the law as it stands to-day, and the ease with which it is avoided more clearly demonstrates its absurdity. Take the city of Boston, which covers part of two counties. The little town of Brookline is just outside the line of delivery. The publisher of a magazine can take his whole issue for a month and mail them at the office at Brookline, and they will come back to Boston and be delivered free.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. WADDELL. If my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi, will permit me, I desire to make an explanation to the House. I find there is among gentlemen a misapprehension as to what the committee has recommended. The fourth section of the bill which gentlemen have sent for, No. 5735, since the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, has been changed, and the bill introduced by Mr. HAMLIN, in the Senate, has been substituted for the fourth section requiring prepayment of postage by a special class of stamps.

Mr. PRICE. Then the bill which is in our hands is not the bill that is now before the House for consideration?

Mr. WADDELL. It is the same bill with a few amendments.

Mr. PRICE. Is the fourth section a part of the bill?

Mr. WADDELL. That section, as it appears in the bill No. 5735, is stricken out and another is substituted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield further?

Mr. WADDELL. I do not desire to take my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi, off the floor, but I think, for the information of the House, it would be better to have the bill read by sections with all the amendments as they stand in the bill as now reported.

Mr. MONEY. If the House desires that that course be adopted, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour allowed for general debate on the bill has expired, but by unanimous consent the gentleman from Mississippi was allowed to proceed. If the gentleman from Mississippi has concluded his remarks the bill will now be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. MONEY. I have not concluded; but I find there is a general demand for the reading of the bill by sections. To that I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can only have the bill read by sections now by unanimous consent unless the gentleman from Mississippi yields the floor.

Mr. MONEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, in reference to the appeals of the circuit court of the United States to which such objection has been made by the gentleman, he will remember that in committee I combated that very proposition. I do not believe that the Post-Office Department would yield to such an ignoble feeling, even in times of high excitement, as to suppress newspapers because they did not agree with it in politics. I give the Department credit for intending to carry out its duties in a proper spirit in that regard, and I desire to say that while I opposed that section of the bill in committee, I do not recollect that my colleague did.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If it would be in order to state what took place in committee I can correct the gentleman?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not strictly in order.

Mr. MONEY. I have no personal vanity whatever in reference to this bill, but I believe it to be a measure which gives simplicity, uniformity, and justice. I believe that it will give satisfaction to the whole country. I do not see a single line to which objection can be taken, and I will say to this House that there is not a member of the committee that has not given days' and nights' toil to the consideration of this matter. I have corresponded with publishers in every part of the country. I have talked with the publishers of daily newspapers. I have a number of letters from publishers which I will not inflict upon the House, and also from leading postmasters. The Post-Office Department itself approves the bill.

It says that the classification of the mail matter and the rates of postage thereon are correct. Now there may be some objection urged as to the admission of merchandise to the mails, and I will be very glad to see that part stricken from all our postal laws, because I do not believe that the Post-Office Department should perform the functions of a common carrier. I do not think it one of the provinces of the Government to go into the express or carrying business; but we found that in the laws, and a portion of the people are not willing to give it up. I think it was a foolish law that reduced the rate upon newspapers to two cents a pound, because that matter is carried at a dead loss to the Government. At the same time there was such a popular demand for the continuance of the law that stands in preference to the amendment offered by the committee that it was impossible for the committee to have acted otherwise and to have yielded to the voice of the people on recommendation of the Department.

Sir, I have no speech to make upon this question; though if there be any objection to be made to any individual clause I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. WADDELL. I will say before the debate closes, and I hope that it will close very soon, that my friend from Illinois, my colleague of the committee, is the only gentleman I have been able to discover out of the forty-five million of the American population, including Indians not taxed, and without regard to race, color, and previous condition of servitude, who has raised any objection to the bill. I hoped he would not raise any objection, and I know he has peculiar notions about such things; but he is the only gentleman I have found who has raised any objection to the bill, because for the last eight months it has been carefully considered by the Department and by all the leading publishers.

We have had conference after conference between the committee of the House of which he is a member, but I will say, in order to do him perfect justice, that I honestly believe that if the ten commandments were offered as a code of morals, if my friend was not allowed to offer an amendment, he would object to them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Would it be in order to test the sense of the House by moving to lay the bill upon the table?

Mr. WADDELL. Can that motion be entertained?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can, for the bill is being considered in the House and not in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Am I in order in calling the attention of my colleague of the committee from North Carolina to the fact that there are other contrary members here beside, myself?

The question was taken upon the motion made by Mr. CUMMINGS; and upon a division there were—ayes 14, noes 76.

Mr. EAMES. No quorum has voted, and every member of the House knows that there is no quorum here.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is the matter debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The gentleman from Rhode Island has a right to object to proceeding without a quorum but not to debate, and the Chair will therefore appoint tellers.

Mr. EAMES. I withdraw the objection.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the first section of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That mailable matter shall be divided into four classes:

First, written matter;
Second, periodical publications under registration;
Third, miscellaneous printed matter;
Fourth, merchandise.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that we may hereafter turn back to the first section of the bill for the purpose of striking out the words "under registration," in case the subsequent section providing for registration is stricken out.

Mr. WADDELL. I object; of course it requires unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "under registration."

Mr. MONEY. Are not the amendments of the committee to be first acted upon?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee has not reported any amendments to this section.

Mr. WADDELL. I will withdraw my objection.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That mailable matter of the first class shall embrace letters, postal cards, and all matters wholly or partly in writing, except as hereinafter provided.

No amendments being offered the Clerk read the third section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That on mailable matter of the first class, except postal cards and drop-letters, postage shall be prepaid at the rate of three cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof; postal cards shall be transmitted through the mails at a postal charge of one cent each, including the cost of manufacture; and drop-letters shall be prepaid at the rate of two cents per half ounce or fraction thereof, including delivery at letter-carrier offices, and one cent for each half ounce or fraction thereof where free delivery by carrier is not established. The Postmaster-General may, however, provide, by regulation, for transmitting unpaid and duly certified letters of soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States to their destination, to be paid on delivery.

Mr. AIKEN. I call the attention of the House to the second line, and I ask for information whether that requires the entire postage upon every letter, and is not that a change of existing law?

Mr. WADDELL. If the gentleman will be patient for a moment and read section 4 he will see that that is all provided for.

Mr. MONEY. The object of the bill is to change the existing law.

Mr. WADDELL. The whole idea of this provision is to secure the payment of the postage.

Mr. AIKEN. In full?

Mr. WADDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. EAMES. I move to amend the section just read by striking out in line 3, before the words "cents for each half ounce," &c., the word "three," and inserting the word "two"; so that it will read:

That on mailable matter of the first class, except postal cards and drop-letters, postage shall be prepaid at the rate of two cents per each half ounce or fraction thereof, &c.

I desire to say a few words upon that proposition to the members of the House, and I wish I could have had the attention of all the members of the House upon this proposition.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment proposes to reduce the postage on letters from three to two cents for the half ounce or any fraction thereof. In no other respect does it change the existing law as to letter postage. If it is adopted it will be a direct benefit to every one who has occasion to write a letter.

It has been recommended by both of the great political parties in their political conventions. The only objection, if it is one, to the adoption of this amendment is that it may increase the deficiency in the postal service. It is not probable that such would be the effect of the change. If it would, this is no reason why it should not be adopted, as under the existing law the deficiency between the postal receipts and the postal expenses is the most equitable and just tax on the people for the expense of the postal service. In only seven or eight States are the receipts equal to the expenditures. There is no justice or equity in the charge of three cents without regard to distance.

But if this amendment is adopted I think the deficiency will rather be diminished than increased. In England the letters carried through the mails in 1837 were 82,000,000. The penny postage in that country went into operation in 1840, and in 1859 the number of letters had increased to 545,000,000. The postal revenue in 1835 which was less than the expenses was about $8,000,000, and in 1859 was $15,000,000, an amount in excess of the postal expenses. Now it may be truly said that because such was the effect of a reduction of postage on letters in England it does not follow that such would be the result in this country. I assent to this, but since the Government has had the control of the postal service in this country great changes have been made in the rates of letter postage.

And nearly all changes which have been made have been in the direction of reducing postage on letters, and the deficiency has been but slightly if any increased. The first law fixing the postage on letters was based on distance, and the rate varied from six cents to twenty-five cents. In 1845 a change was made to five cents under and ten cents over three hundred miles.

In 1844, the year previous to this change, the receipts were $4,237,287.83 and the expenditures $4,296,512.70. In 1845, the next year after the change, the receipts were $4,289,841.80 and the expenditures $4,320,731.99, showing a small increase of expenditures over the receipts; but in 1849 the receipts were $4,705,176.28 and the expenditures $4,479,049.13, showing an excess of receipts of more than $200,000.

In 1851 the law was again changed, and a distinction was made between a letter prepaid and a letter unpaid, three cents if prepaid and five cents if not prepaid.

The receipts in 1850, the year before this change, were $5,499,984.86 and the expenditures $5,212,953.43; and in 1851, the year after the change, the receipts were $6,410,604.33, and the expenditures $6,278,493.68, showing under this change an excess of receipts over expenditures.

In 1855 the letter postage was three cents under and ten cents over three hundred miles. Under this law, which was an increase on the rates of letter postage, the deficiency was increased.

By the act of March 3, 1863, the rate was fixed at three cents for the half ounce or any fraction thereof, without regard to distance.

The receipts in 1862, the year before this change, were $8,299,820.90 and the expenditures $11,125,364.13. In 1863, the first year after this change, the receipts were $11,163,789.59 and the expenditures $11,314,296.84. In 1864, the receipts were $12,438,253.78 and the expenditures $12,644,786.20, showing a great increase of receipts and a great reduction of the deficiencies in these years; and in 1865 the receipts were nearly equal to the expenditures. Since 1865, under this law, the receipts have increased from about $14,000,000 to about $29,000,000 and the deficiency has been from $4,000,000 to $7,000,000.

These figures demonstrate that the reduction of letter postage as heretofore made has resulted in a large increase of the revenue, and that the deficiency has been but slightly increased, notwithstanding the great extension of postal facilities.

The law of March 3, 1863, at the uniform rate of three cents without regard to distance, is now the law, and no change has been made for nearly sixteen years. Is it wise, in view of the facts which I have stated, to make this change now? I think that it is.

The past legislation shows that the reductions which have been made have not much increased the deficiency between receipts and expenses, and this deficiency has arisen not from letter postage, but from the second and third class of mail matter, which has been reduced about four millions by the excess of receipts on letter postage.

Since the law of March 3, 1863, the postal card has been introduced. There is no reason why it should pay less than letter postage. It weighs as much and costs as much to send it through the mails. The result of reducing postage on letters will be to diminish the receipts of one cent on postal cards, and increase the receipts of two cents on letters, and thus the deficiency would not be increased, but probably would be diminished.

I repeat, even if this deficiency should be increased there is no more equitable mode to meet it than under the general law for raising revenue.

If this Congress wishes to pass a bill which will be a direct benefit to the whole people there is no better mode of doing it than by the adoption of this amendment.

This proposition is one of great importance to every citizen. It can be made, I think, without increasing the deficiency between the receipts and expenditures of the postal service. But if there should be such increase, the deficiency would be more justly met by the general tax under the existing revenue laws than under the present rate upon letter postage.

Mr. Speaker, I am politically in the minority of this House, but the amendment which I propose is one which is neither political nor sectional. It will, if adopted, be a direct benefit to the people of all parts of the country. Why not, then, agree to this amendment, especially as it is not probable that it will increase the deficiency in the postal service? And, even if it does, it will apportion this increase more equitably than under the existing law.

Congress can do no wiser act upon the subject of the postal service than to adopt the amendment which I have proposed. I have for many years endeavored to secure the adoption of this proposition, and I hope now the time has come when this House will approve it.

[Before Mr. EAMES concluded his remarks the five minutes expired. Mr. WADDELL took the floor and yielded his time to Mr. EAMES, who concluded his remarks as above.]

Mr. MONEY. I move to strike out the last word. I am sorry to say that I could not hear all the arguments of my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES;] and I am very sorry that I could not. But I did hear his amendment, and understand that it is a proposition to reduce the rate of letter postage from three cents to two cents for each half ounce or fraction thereof.

Now, it is a well-known fact that we are called upon every year to make up a deficit of from four to six millions of dollars for the purpose of carrying on the postal service of the Government. There is no complaint from any part of the country in regard to the present rates of letter postage. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] gets his idea I suppose from the penny postage of Great Britain, where the longest mail-route does not extend over four hundred and fifty miles. It is possible for letters to be carried in such a territory as that for two cents where they are carried for not more than four hundred and fifty miles at the farthest, when it would not be equally advisable to carry letters in this country even for three cents for three or four thousand miles. England is largely a commercial country and its longest mail-route does not extend over four hundred and fifty miles.

There has not been a man from any part of the country who has ever come before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House, except my honorable friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES,] and urged the adoption of such a proposition as he has now submitted. No recommendation has come from the Post-Office Department to that effect. No application for such reduction has been made by the publishers of any papers, who have the largest correspondence by letter possibly of any persons in this country. No such proposition has been urged by the great lawyers of the country, who have extensive correspondence by letter. The proposition has come from no solitary individual, except my friend from Rhode Island. Now, I ask the House to entertain no proposition of that sort.

Mr. WADDELL. I call for a vote.

Mr. MONEY. I will withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. EAMES. Before the gentleman takes his seat will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONEY. With pleasure.

Mr. EAMES. The gentleman from Mississippi says that before his committee there have been the publishers of newspapers and magazines and persons interested in that class of matter. Has he had before that committee anybody from the people to advocate this proposition?

This is a proposition that interests everybody throughout the country. Hence I say that no appearance in behalf of this proposition has been made before the committee.

Mr. MONEY. I will say that we have had an "appearance" in the person of my honorable friend from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] who argued this question very eloquently before the committee; but I am sorry to say that he did not succeed in convincing us—not from a lack of strength in his argument but because the committee saw that it would be impossible, without absolute detriment to the service, that this reduction in the rate of postage should be made. If the deficit of the Post-Office Department be increased from $6,000,000 to $12,000,000 annually, it must necessitate a curtailment of the postal facilities now enjoyed by the country. It is not expected that the postal service should be a source of revenue, but it is expected that it should be administered upon sound business principles so as to be as small a tax as possible upon the revenues of the Government, while at the same time furnishing such facilities as will meet the approbation of the people.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. EAMES, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 11, noes not counted.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "established," in line 9, the following:

Whenever any person in course of his business has had or may hereafter have printed matter printed upon postal cards, and the same shall not be sent through the mails, then such person may have blank postal cards furnished him in lieu of those so printed upon, on payment by such person of the cost of manufacture of the same.

Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment ought to receive the support of the House. In all our large commercial centers many business firms buy large quantities of postal cards, upon which they print their business cards or other advertising matter, to be transmitted through the country. From one cause or another they may not use these cards, and under the present law they have to lose them. This amendment proposes simply that any person who in course of business has postal cards printed may, upon returning them to the post-office, receive new cards in lieu thereof, provided he repays to the Government the cost of the manufacture.

This is a matter of no small moment to a very large number of business firms. It frequently happens that these firms get from the post-office cards to the amount of hundreds of dollars, which, after they have been printed upon in connection with the business of the firm, are never sent through the mails. The firm changes its business; or there is no longer need for advertising in the particular manner. My proposition is that in such cases business men may return these cards upon which matter has been printed and receive from the Government new postal cards on paying the actual expense to the Government. Under this provision the Government will lose nothing, and I think there can be no objection to it. A large number of business men have written to me asking that this provision be inserted in the postal law.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker—[cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]—if there is any danger of this amendment being adopted I would like to say something; but I do not believe there is.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all mail matter of the first class upon which one full rate of postage has been prepaid shall be forwarded to its destination charged with the unpaid rates, to be collected on delivery; but postmasters, before delivering the same or any article of mail matter upon which prepayment in full has not been made, shall affix or cause to be affixed and canceled, as ordinary stamps are canceled, one or more stamps equivalent in value to the amount of postage due on such article of mail matter, which stamps shall be of such special design and denomination as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, and which shall in no case be sold by any postmaster nor received by him in prepayment of postage. That in lieu of the commission now allowed postmasters at offices of the fourth class upon the amount of unpaid letter postage collected, such postmasters shall receive a commission upon the amount of such special stamps so canceled, the same as now allowed upon postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and newspaper and periodical stamps canceled as postages on matter actually mailed at their offices. That any postmaster who shall collect the postage due upon any article of mail matter, which he may deliver without having previously affixed and canceled such special stamps as hereinbefore provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of —— dollars.

Mr. OLIVER. I move to amend by inserting after the word "postage," in the fourteenth line of this section, the following:

Letters on which one rate is not prepaid shall be forwarded and double rates collected thereon at the office of delivery in the manner herein provided.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 5. That mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspaper and other periodical publications which have been duly registered as hereinafter provided, and which shall comply with the following conditions:

First. It must be regularly issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

Third. It must be formed of printed paper sheet or sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding such as distinguishes printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Fourth. It must be published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and have a legitimate list of paid subscriptions, or orders from news-agents: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second class regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "publications," in line 19, the word "specially;" by striking out, in line 20, the word "primarily;" and by inserting at the end of the section the words "and not for dissemination to regular paying subscribers;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second class regular publications specially designed for advertising purposes and not for dissemination to regular paying subscribers.

Mr. WADDELL. I do not know that the committee have any objection to this amendment. It is a mere question of phraseology. I suppose the gentleman from Ohio is trying to arrive at the same result which the committee sought.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not wish to delay the progress of this bill, but it is perhaps proper that I should state very briefly why I offered this amendment. I believe it is reported that under a clause similar to that contained in this section a man who was so unfortunate as to be at the same time the regular publisher of a paper and also the owner of a saw-mill in the same county, inserted in one corner of his paper a notice in regard to sawing logs at his saw-mill, whereupon the Post-Office Department decided that his paper, although published regularly in all other respects, was primarily an advertising sheet and therefore could not be circulated at the ordinary rates of second-class mail matter.

Mr. WADDELL. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MONEY. I object to the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. The object of my amendment is not to get into the law a provision which will allow any kind of publication merely for the purpose of advertising sent out under any guise whatever, to advertise the business or occupation of the men publishing it. I have drawn my amendment to guard this from any evil of that kind. I know of many publications, and other members tell me the same thing, I know notably of one publication, I have the copy of the paper here before me, that has over fifty thousand subscribers, I am told over two thousand in the State of Texas alone, which has very little advertising patronage, paid or unpaid, very little indeed as compared with another paper I have in my hand, and I am told the Department is disposed to rule this paper with regular subscribers does not come within the rule of second-class mail-matter because it happens the publishers of the paper have another occupation if you please. They are manufacturers; but if you will read the paper you will hardly find I think—it is impossible to find a reference to their own manufacturing business in it anywhere, and there are nine-tenths of the entire print of general news for the people. If they should happen to get in a reference to the business of their own, according to the present law it will be held that it should be paid at the rate of third-class matter, as I read it.

I hold in my hand what I picked up this evening, what I would call an advertising sheet; it is called the New York Daily Commercial Bulletin. There are two or three columns that might be called general news matter; all the rest, with the exception of some little commercial quotations, is advertising matter. I have seen the Commercial Advertiser of New York with less than a column of general news in it and all the rest paid matter that may go all over the country as second class mail matter, while another paper is to be excluded on a simple technicality. The word "primarily" is in this bill, and I do not wish to mislead anybody, but I understand it is substantially the language of the present law which is unjustly applied to publishers.

Mr. WADDELL. If my friend will allow me to interrupt him I will call his attention to the broad distinction between the paper from which he has read and a paper like Baldwin's Monthly, of New York.

Mr. KEIFER. If this is published for the purpose of circulating with a regular list of subscribers my amendment excludes it.

Mr. WADDELL. Baldwin's Monthly has a large amount of really interesting literary matter.

Mr. KEIFER. If it is merely to cover up, if the gentleman will pardon me, general advertising business to be advertised by sending this out to persons not regular subscribers, then it is excluded in the mails as second-class matter under the amendment I propose.

Mr. WADDELL. It is excluded under the amendment we propose.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to still exclude it.

Mr. WADDELL. Publications of that kind which contain a great deal of valuable literary matter, but which are sheets published for advertising purposes, are excluded under our bill from the privileges of this rate.

Mr. KEIFER. My amendment excludes all publications specially designed for advertising purposes and not for dissemination of news to regular paying subscribers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MONEY. I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Speaker, the object of the amendment as provided in this bill is not to exclude the legitimate journal from getting as much advertising matter as they can. The character of the journal must be first fixed as one for the dissemination of useful knowledge. This bill says distinctly if a newspaper is devoted to some special industry it can be admitted to the privileged rate, but when it is devoted primarily, as expressed here, to advertising purposes, it is not entitled to the privileged rate, nor should it be. If a gentleman or a company have a large business and they publish a newspaper it is prima facie for the purpose of advertising that business, and it makes no difference how much general matter there may be to cover up that design, it cannot be concealed.

Well, the design of this bill is to exclude from the privileged rates such matter as that, because no honest business man ought to come before Congress and ask the Government to circulate advertisements at a rate which everybody knows is a dead loss to the Government.

If a man is not able to conduct his business and pay for advertisements, he ought to close his shop. But to come and ask a special rate by which the Government may promote his business is a thing that ought not to be tolerated a moment by the House.

I desire to say one word about the decisions of the Post-Office Department. So far as I know, and I have inquired particularly into this matter, the effort has been made to give a logical and just decision upon this matter; a decision that cannot be attributed to any design on the part of the Department to misconstrue the law so as to oppress the men who publish papers, because the men who attempted to get it were not covered by the provisions of the law.

The question was taken upon Mr. KEIFER'S amendment; and, on a division there were—ayes 13, noes 49.

No further count being insisted upon, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read section 6 of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the section by striking out, beginning in line 19 with the words "in case of refusals," down to and including "order thereon," in line 29, as follows:

> In case of refusal by a postmaster to issue such certificate of registration, an appeal may be taken by the publisher to the Postmaster-General. The proprietor of any publication refused registration under this section, or whose certificate of registration has been revoked under section 7, may, on proper notice, apply to the district court in the district in which the office of publication is situated for a mandamus against the postmaster to compel the allowance of such registration; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the said court to hear such application and make the proper order thereon.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, for this reason, that I am opposed to the entire section, and I am apprehensive that if the Congress of the United States commits itself to the idea that the newspapers of this country must depend upon the will of anybody before their circulation can become complete and reach the people, they will be opening the door to the establishment of a censorship in the United States; and if we are to have a censorship existing in the village postmasters or in the Postmaster General, we should concede to the citizen the right of applying to the courts of the country to enforce whatever his rights might be.

It may be that you are protecting the public revenue by this step. It may be that you are making a classification which is necessary to the revenues of the country; but I fear that you are taking a step and establishing a precedent that may lead no man to-day can tell where, and under that apprehension I shall vote to strike this entire section from the bill; but so long as it remains in the bill I shall claim for the citizen the protection of the judiciary of the country.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman may strike out the section, yet this power would remain with the Postmaster-General still. It is simply a question of administration, that and nothing more. He has now the right, and it ought to be continued in him. The right to have questions of this sort tried before the courts is entirely unnecessary. I think we may trust the Postmaster-General with this power as we have always done.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the whole section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote must be first taken upon the amendment to the section offered by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

The question was taken upon Mr. BLOUNT'S amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 37.

No further count being insisted upon, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move now to strike out the entire section. I am opposed to this section for the reason that it will open the way for the establishment of a censorship over the press. These publications are to be admitted to the mails under such regulations as may be prescribed, and are to be subjected to the investigation of whom? Of the postmaster at the place where the newspaper is published in the first instance, and if he should be moved by the arguments of the publisher so that he would allow his newspapers to be put into the mails, all right; but if the local postmaster should decide otherwise he must go to the Postmaster-General, and there prosecute an appeal for permission to send his paper through the mails.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is not done now; if the Postmaster-General has not the power of deciding that question now?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the Postmaster-General has the power to prohibit matter from going into the mails, that power should be taken away from him.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. If this section is stricken out, how can a postmaster detect what is obscene literature?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand that it is the duty of the postmaster to read everything which passes through the mails in his office to see whether it is obscene or not.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. It is his duty to see that no obscene matter passes through the mails.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is a criminal law which punishes persons for sending such matter through the mails, and whenever you can determine that a man has been guilty of that offense you can punish him.

I do not propose to open the door and authorize the postmasters of this country to determine what newspapers shall be admitted into the mails and what shall not be. I prefer to provide by criminal statutes against using the mails improperly, and to punish those who do use them improperly. But to establish a censorship over the mails, which will require the publishers of newspapers all over the country to go to the postmasters in order to obtain permission to put their newspapers into the post-office, is against the free spirit of our institutions. I am opposed to the whole section and hope it will be stricken out.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to meet the objection urged by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] I am sure that if he were at all familiar with the law as it now exists he would not have moved this amendment, because the censorship of which he complains already exists.

I would like to know of the gentleman how the newspapers are to-day admitted into the mails, unless the postmaster has power to examine a newspaper and see whether it is a mere advertising circular or not? It is a fact that this censorship exists to-day, and the object of this section is that it may be applied logically by postmasters all over the country. Now a postmaster in California may decide that a paper is admissible to the mails, and one in Maine may decide that it is not admissible; and the one in Maine may refuse to deliver the paper after it has been carried in the mails for three thousand miles. This section is for the protection of every legitimate newspaper in the United States, and will operate only against those that are not in any proper sense entitled to have this privilege. I hope the motion to strike out will not prevail.

Mr. WADDELL. I wish to say one word, Mr. Speaker, and then I will move that the House adjourn. This subject has been under consideration by almost every publisher in the United States, by the Post-Office Department, and by the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman, for the past eighteen months. And now at the last moment, when everybody interested in it seems to be satisfied with it, this bill is talked to death by chin music. I move that the House now adjourn, and I insist upon my motion.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 49, noes 30.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 22 in the affirmative—not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 24, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 6126) to establish post-routes in the several States herein named was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of $32,200 for additional appropriations for the office of the surveyor-general of California, together with letters from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the surveyor-general of California, explanatory thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, relative to a deficiency of $5,000 in the appropriation for telegraphing and purchase of Indian supplies; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the indorsement of General Pope, on a communication of the commanding officer of the district of New Mexico, on the subject of the location of a post at Pogosa Springs, and indorsements of Generals Sheridan and Sherman; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of an inspection of the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, by Brigadier-General R. B. Marcy, Inspector-General of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Matilda Joslyn Gage, and Susan B. Anthony, officers of the National Woman's Suffrage Association, praying for the passage of Senate joint resolution No. 12, providing for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States protecting the rights of women citizens, and also that the House Judiciary Committee be relieved from the further consideration of a similar resolution.

Mr. FERRY. If there be no objection, I ask that the petition be read at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be reported by the Secretary.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives
of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas more than forty thousand well-known men and women, citizens of thirty-five States and five Territories, have petitioned the Forty-fifth Congress, asking for an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; and

Whereas a resolution providing for such constitutional amendment is upon the Calendar, (Senate resolution No. 12, second session Forty-fifth Congress,) and a similar resolution is pending upon a tie vote in the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas the women citizens of the United States are joint heirs with men of this Republic, constitute one-half of the people, and have an inalienable right to an equal voice with men in the nation's councils; and

Whereas this Republic is governed by opinions, and not by force of arms; and

Whereas women citizens, being denied the right to have their opinions counted at the ballot-box, are compelled to hold all other rights subject to the favor, passions, and caprices of men; and

Whereas in answer to the appeals of so large a number of peaceable, law-abiding, honorable petitioners, it is just and courteous that the Forty-fifth Congress should express its opinion and leave its record upon this grave question of human rights: Therefore,

We pray your honorable body to take from the Calendar and pass Senate resolution No. 12, (second session Forty-fifth Congress,) providing for an amendment to the Constitution protecting the rights of women citizens; and

We further pray you to relieve the House Judiciary Committee from the further consideration of the sixteenth amendment woman suffrage resolution brought to a tie vote in that committee February 5, 1878, that it may be submitted to the House of Representatives for immediate action.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON,
President.
MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE,
Corresponding Secretary.
SUSAN B. ANTHONY,
Chairman Executive Committee.

Mr. SHARON. I present resolutions of the Legislature of Nevada, in favor of the passage of a law prohibiting alleged discriminations, exactions, and extortions by the Central Pacific Railroad.

Mr. President, I desire to make a single remark upon this subject. The evils complained of in these resolutions have existed for a long time and are of a very grievous character. The only power possible to control this matter of the freights and fares as between States rests with the National Legislature. Our people have a particular and a peculiar right to ask for the modification of these rates. The Congress of the United States has subsidized these roads by money and lands, the property of the people. The bounty of the Government in favor of these roads has been largely extended. When the prerogative of the Government is exercised by way of subsidy for the benefit of a corporation it assumes a quasi-public character, and I think the people have certainly a right to demand that the legislative bodies who have made this grant of moneys and lands shall see to it that they are not imposed upon by these corporations, the creatures of their creation. In other words, the creature cannot rise above the creator. We look to the power of the General Government to regulate these freights and fares, and we think on behalf of the people we have a right to demand it. I cannot too earnestly direct the attention of the Committee on Railroads and of the Senate to the wrongs complained of by the people of Nevada through both her legislative bodies now in session. They have already existed too long. I move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I present the petition of A. J. Copeland, S. P. Hebard, and a large number of other persons, of Chelsea, Vermont, praying that the bill for arrears of pensions shall pass.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. As the bill has already passed, I desire to say that I think many of the persons who signed this petition would have hesitated about signing it if they had known the amount that would be involved, and perhaps the injustice of some portions of the practical operation of the law. I am very sure that I should have hesitated in voting for the bill if I had known the vast amount which is now reported by the Commissioner of Pensions as the probable amount that will be required to pay these pensions the next and succeeding year.

Mr. CONKLING. What is that amount?

Mr. MORRILL. It is very large. I have understood that it is something like $80,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. We cannot hear the Senator on this side of the Chamber. Did the Senator name the amount that it would probably take to carry out the provisions of that act?

Mr. CONKLING. He spoke of the amount required to execute the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator from Vermont whether he has information on that subject?

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that the Department are making an accurate computation of the amount, and as a rough estimate I have understood it to be asserted by the Pension Bureau that it will require $80,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be recollected that it was stated here that the highest amount estimated was $20,000,000; now it is eighty million.

Mr. BLAINE presented the petition of James B. Hitchcock and others, of Bath, Maine, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HILL presented the petition of D. H. Baldwin and others, citizens of Savannah, Georgia, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 5125) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Erwin;" which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRUCE presented the petition of Adolph Feininger, of Columbia, South Carolina, praying compensation for property destroyed and appropriated by United States military forces during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1446) for promoting the efficiency of the corps of chaplains of the United States Navy, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 6143) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD RICE.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report back for present action, if it does not cause any debate, a small bill which provides simply for authorizing the issue of duplicate bonds for lost bonds to the amount of about $5,000. I presume it will not cause any debate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1660) for the relief of Edward Rice. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to Edward Rice, of Chicago, Illinois, formerly of Worcester, Massachusetts, duplicates of certain coupon bonds issued under the act of March 3, 1865, known as consols of 1867, which are specified, together with duplicates of the coupons of these bonds maturing after July 1, 1868.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAULSBURY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1696) directing the removal of obstructions from the harbor at the Delaware breakwater; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to be indulged by the Senate one moment while I call the attention of the Committee on Commerce, to which I shall move the reference of the bill, to the importance of action upon it. By conference with the Engineer department I find there is no authority in that department to remove these obstructions and no money by which they could remove them if there were authority to do it. I have drawn up the bill with a view to meet that condition of affairs, and I ask the committee to take it into early consideration, as these obstructions are a serious impediment to commerce. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1697) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave, without previous notice, and at the request of gentlemen interested in such matters, to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1698) providing for security on appeals or writs of error; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McPHERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1699) extending the limits of the port of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1700) to incorporate the Spanish-American Commercial Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GORDON, it was Ordered, That the papers in reference to the claims of the State of Georgia be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and be delivered by the Secretary of the Senate to Hon. W. O. Tuggle, agent of the State of Georgia.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BECK and Mr. MERRIMON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to recommit to the Committee on the Judiciary the bill (S. No. 468) to extend the operation of the act of February 27, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for settlements with certain railway companies," for one year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be recommitted, the Chair hearing no objection.

WATER SUPPLY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask that the bill (S. No. 1529) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to adjust and fix the water rates within said District, which I reported the other day, be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to call up the resolution which I submitted on the 17th instant, being Miscellaneous Document No. 35.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of commissions or other compensation paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services in negotiating the sale of bonds and other obligations of the United States, from the year 1862 until the present time; when and to whom such commissions or compensation was paid; and, when paid to syndicates, firms, corporations, or companies, to state the names of the persons composing the same. And also to inform the Senate whether any, and, if any, what amount of commissions or other compensation has been paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services rendered in refunding any of the bonds of the United States; and if any such payments have been made to state when and to whom made; and also whether interest has been paid on called bonds at the same time that interest was accruing on the bonds sold to redeem the same, and whether such double interest has been uniformly paid while the refunding operation has been in progress, or on bonds sold for resumption purposes, specifying whether there has been any exception to such payments of double interest, and who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of such exception, and how much double interest has been paid on each class of bonds, and the total amount thereof; and whether the money received for bonds sold by any bank or syndicate has, in all cases, been allowed to remain on deposit with the national banks acting as Government depositories pending this call of bonds, specifying the names of the banks and the length of time during which the proceeds of the bonds sold have been left on deposit with each bank; and whether at any time any gold coin has been delivered by the Treasury to any parties concerned in the negotiation of United States bonds or otherwise in exchange for or upon the security of United States bonds, or in advance of the payment thereof, pending any call of bonds on which interest was allowed or paid up to the date of the maturity of the call; and also whether any money in the Treasury held for the payment of overdue called bonds has been left on deposit without interest in any Government depository, and what was the largest amount thereof at any one time, stating the names of the banks in which such money was deposited, and what security the Treasury held for the payment thereof when demanded.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the resolution, to which I think my friend from Delaware has no objection:

Provided, That information heretofore communicated to either House of Congress shall not be repeated, but references to the documents where the same is to be found shall be made; and names of subscribers to popular loans since June, 1877, to whom no commissions have been paid or allowed, may be omitted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no objection to the first clause of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont; but the latter clause refers to a matter about which there is no inquiry in the resolution. That part of the amendment provides that the names of subscribers to the bonds need not be given. I have made no such inquiry in the resolution itself. I am sure the Senator from Vermont does not wish to obstruct the full inquiry which is proposed by my resolution, but I can conceive how his amendment if agreed to may do so. It may be that some syndicate or bank has subscribed for the bonds and the Government at the same time allowed commissions for the sale of the bonds.

Mr. MORRILL. But the Senator will see that I have provided that the response shall only exclude those to whom no commissions have been paid.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I observe it does omit those to whom no commission or compensation has been allowed.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to say that the amendment is simply intended to obviate an immense amount of labor on the part of the clerks in reporting a great many thousand subscribers for very small sums, fifty and one hundred dollars.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Delaware to accept the modification proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As thus amended, will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 1374) authorizing the chancellor of the Smithsonian Institution to appoint an acting secretary in certain cases.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. THURMAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

POST-ROUTE BILL—REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, at the close of the last session the conference committee on the part of the Senate made a report upon the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States herein named, and for other purposes. I ask that that report, as it was not adopted at that time, be taken up for action with a view to asking for a further committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the resolution of the House of Representatives, dated June 15, 1878, as follows:

"Resolved, That House bill 4286 'to establish post-roads in the several States herein named,' with the Senate amendments thereto, be returned to the Senate, as a part of said amendments are in the nature of and constitute a revenue bill," have met, and after full and free conference have been unable to agree "touching the matters of difference between the two Houses" indicated by said House resolution.

The conferees upon the part of the Senate proposed to waive all discussion as to the questions of privilege at issue between the two Houses and to take up the House bill No. 4286 with the Senate amendments thereto, and consider them for the purpose of making a report upon the several matters embraced therein.

The conferees upon the part of the House decline to agree to this proposition for the reason that they do not, in their opinion, possess any power, under the resolution of the House, to consider the bill or amendments, without an enlargement thereof.

S. J. KIRKWOOD,
A. S. PADDOCK,
S. B. MAXEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
J. G. CARLISLE,
A. M. WADDELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What action does the Senator desire?

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the report be concurred in.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to inquire how many conferences there have been upon this bill?

Mr. FERRY. There have been two conferences. This is the report of the second conference. I will state to the Senator from Maryland that I understand there is perhaps a possibility of an agreement between the two Houses at the present time, and with that understanding the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have instructed me to ask for a further committee of conference, for the purpose of testing whether the two Houses can agree upon the measure.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to ask whether one of the disagreeing amendments put upon that bill by the Senate was not what is known as the subsidy for steamship lines? If so, I do not think the bill should go back to a conference, as that amendment was passed by the Senate in the hasty hours at the close of the last session. I prefer that that proposition should come up in the regular way.

Mr. FERRY. I will state to the Senator from New York that in the conference committee the merits of the amendments to the bill were not fully considered, because the conference did not reach to them; but I will answer directly the question put by the Senator from New York by saying that the amendments do include a provision for what is called a subsidy. The object of another conference is to see whether the two Houses cannot agree to the bill in the main either by striking out that or other objectionable features.

It is the desire of the committee to suggest to the Senate that a further effort be made on the part of the Senate for an agreement between the two Houses. After that shall have been done by the appointment of a third committee of conference, the Senate will have done its duty.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I want to invite the attention of the Senate to the condition of this question, because I think there is a great deal more in it than Senators will suppose, unless they have given to the subject more attention than they give to ordinary questions. The House of Representatives have declared, according to the report of the conference committee, that some of our amendments to this bill are in the nature of a revenue bill, and upon that ground they refuse to consider them at all. It is very clear that if there is an amendment in the nature of a revenue bill, the House is right and the Senate is wrong. I do not believe the Senate as a body or any of the members that compose this body has the slightest disposition on earth to intrench upon the privileges of the House or to seek to originate a revenue bill. What is the objection? It may be right, it may be wrong; it is necessary to settle a question of right or wrong in our action. We added an amendment to the bill providing for mail service between the United States and Brazil. If that be a revenue measure, if the spending of money is the raising of money and if the House is to take that ground, when we pass a bill that calls for an expenditure of money, folding their arms in dignity around them and saying "this is a revenue bill and we will not consider it," it is a matter which challenges the attention of the Senate and we must not, unless we are unfaithful to the trust reposed in our hands, seek to avoid it. If it be a revenue measure to add an appropriation for mail service between Brazil and the United States because it appropriates money, there is hardly a bill that originates in this body but may be taken as a revenue measure just as much as that.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state that the question of this being a revenue bill was not raised in connection with the appropriation the Senator speaks of. It was raised in connection with the subject of changing the rates of postage, which was considered to be a change of the revenue laws in reference to the support of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Maine will allow me a moment, I desire to call his attention to the fact that more especially was the objection raised upon the point of the admission of books free of duty that were admitted by the other members of the postal union. A clause in the bill permits books that are admitted free in the foreign mails to be admitted free in the mails of the United States, and on that point the House said it was an interference with the revenue, and therefore beyond the province of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was not present at the time of the action of the committee, but I gathered the objection which I supposed I was making from one of the members of the conference committee, having myself been absent. I understood that the distinct ground taken by the House was that the appropriation was in the nature of a revenue bill. I suppose I may be allowed to refer to the records of that body, and the records of that body show that they absolutely refused to vote upon that proposition. Hence I drew the inference that that was the clause to which they objected. But if you place it upon the other clause, to wit the admission of books from a foreign country free of duty, the answer I think is equally clear and plain that under the treaty-making power a treaty was negotiated by which such books were to be admitted as stipulated free of duty; and the law which we propose does not seek to vary the existing law, but to make it susceptible of being carried out properly and harmoniously by proper provisions of law. It was upon the other point, however, that I was mainly interested, and if I was wrong in that, as I am now told by members of the committee of conference I was, I then will say I have no objection that there shall be another conference.

Mr. KERNAN. The difficulty alluded to by the Senator from Maine, whether the appropriation of money, as is done by this bill, belongs to a bill which must originate in the House, I hope will not be settled upon the bill in question. The bill in question is one to establish post-routes. There were put upon that bill in this body provisions in reference to running two lines of steamers under a contract, with a large subsidy to each, from the ports of New York and New Orleans. That proposition should come up as a distinct and separate measure. That has been the practice in the past. In 1865, when the experiment was tried by a contract for a line of steamers under a subsidy of $150,000 a year from New York to Rio, it was done by a distinct bill covering that subject. As that is a question that ought to be settled upon its merits I object to any action which will have it settled on a bill relating to post-routes, where men may be forced to vote for other reasons than upon the merits of so important a measure as these subsidies, involving as they do the expenditure of three millions of money. Therefore, I hope we shall not take it up now. If there are merits in these subsidies for steamship lines we have half the session before us to have a distinct bill on that subject brought in and acted on upon its merits.

There was in this post-route bill also that went to the conference committee put on here, if I remember aright, a provision by which the franking privilege as to all matters substantially was restored. I, for one, do not wish to have that put on as an amendment to the post-route bill, and acted upon in that way. I trust, therefore, we shall not send this conference report back; but if there is a question on which the Houses differ, important as I conceive that to be which was mentioned by the senior Senator from Maine, let us raise a committee and have that acted upon and settled by itself. At the very last hours of the last session these amendments were put on the bill. I hope now it will not be sent back to have those questions come up again as a part of the report of a conference committee to be voted on as a whole. Let those two measures stand on their merits, particularly the subsidy feature, which is very important.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from New York is laboring under a misapprehension when he says the restoration of the franking privilege was a feature embodied in this bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I said it was an amendment put on in the Senate, as I understood.

Mr. FERRY. An amendment was added extending it to certain officers, so as to treat the officers of the Government alike, but not a general franking privilege.

Mr. KERNAN. Then I withdraw that remark. I thought we put on a general franking privilege.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator from New York is correct in that. A general franking privilege is upon the bill by an amendment of the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. I think we put it on as to all official correspondence. I do not want to have to define what is official and what is not, but that is a minor matter. The other was a thing that I think should not now at this stage of the session or at any other stage be sent to a conference committee. It is important legislation in itself as a precedent as to giving subsidies to steamship lines, and it should not be on such a bill, but should come up in a distinct measure, as was the case I know in 1865, when a subsidy measure was passed on its merits, and I hope this will be.

Mr. FERRY. I spoke from recollection; I may be incorrect or I may be right. The matter stands thus: The Senate adopted several amendments to the House bill providing for certain post-routes. The House, instead of considering the amendments, refused to act upon them, and acceded to a committee of conference asked on the part of the Senate. When the conference met the House managers were unwilling to consider the merits of the amendments, it being near the last day of the session. There was not in fact time perhaps to consider the merits of the whole question. Therefore the conference committee agreed to report that which is now pending for adoption.

The object of asking for a third conference is to see whether the two Houses can now agree; whether, in other words, the conference committees can agree to act on the merits of the question submitted to them in the amendments and not on a question of the privileges of the two Houses. That is my object, and none other. It may be found, if another conference committee is appointed and the conferees meet, that the House managers may be disposed to meet the Senate managers and consider the amendments, and may be willing to suggest to the two Houses the rejection or adoption of modifications to the bill. If that should be accomplished, then the object of the Senator from New York perhaps might be reached. Until that is tested we cannot understand whether there can be any agreement whatever between the two Houses. It has been intimated very directly that there might be an agreement between the two Houses if another conference committee was appointed, and I trust the Senate will be disposed to adopt the report. At least they should act on the report made by their conferees and then try a third conference, when my impression is that some agreement will be reached.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire that the Clerk shall read the amendment we put on this bill about the franking privilege, so that it may be seen whether I was right or wrong in regard to that matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report that particular amendment to the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That the President and Vice-President of the United States, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send free through the mail written or printed communications not exceeding two ounces and a half in weight, and the name of the President, the Vice-President, and of each Senator, Representative, Delegate, Secretary of the Senate, or Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be written on the letters or communications which they shall respectively send through the mail.

Mr. KERNAN. That was according to my recollection.

Mr. FERRY. I stand corrected from the record. My impression was that the amendment offered covering that entire ground was rejected by the Senate. I find it was adopted. The Senator from New York was correct.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was not at the meeting of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads when the chairman was directed to call the attention of the Senate to this conference report of the last session. If I had been present I should have voted against bringing it before the Senate. It seems to me to be entirely unnecessary. If I understand the case it is simply this: At the last session we passed a certain bill having certain features upon it in reference to subsidies and the franking privilege and sent it to the House of Representatives. They declined to consider our bill and so informed the Senate, whereupon a committee was appointed to confer with a committee on the part of the House to see whether the matter could not be arranged so that the bill could be considered by the House. That conference committee, as it is termed, failed to bring about an arrangement whereby the House would consider the bill sent to them by the Senate; but I apprehend that it is competent for the House now, if they think proper, to take up the bill which we passed at the last session and consider it without any action of the Senate in reference to this conference report. The bill, I suppose, is either on the files of the House or on the files of the Senate. If on the files of the House they can take it up at once; and if it is on the files of the Senate, then it is here in the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. If my colleague on the committee will allow me, I will say that is all true enough, but I do not suppose the Senator desires to relieve the Senate of its duty and obligation to try to its fullest extent to reconcile the disagreement between the two Houses; and it is with that view that I have made this motion. My colleague on the committee was not at the last meeting of the committee or he would know that I am acting under instructions of the committee. The committee thought another committee of conference might gain the object sought by the former one, that we being now in a different session, with perhaps a different temper of the two Houses, an agreement might be brought about.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I understand, a bill has passed the House on this same subject.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only propose to occupy a moment.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask him if he means to say that this bill having been returned from the House to the Senate after disagreement by a conference committee can yet be considered by the House? This bill is in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The House, I suppose, by resolution could obtain the consent of the Senate to have it returned to that body, if it sees proper to act on it.

Mr. PADDOCK. Possibly the House might adopt a resolution requesting the Senate to return it; but is it not more proper, the Senate having possession of the bill, and there having been a disagreement of one conference committee, that the Senate itself should now take the initiative?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is common in legislative bodies, when bills have been sent from one body to the other, for the latter to allow the previous body to send and get them, if it wishes to take further action.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is an exception.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But I was about to say that a new post-route bill has come to this body from the House. Why not take up that bill, amend it, if amendments are necessary, and act on that bill without raising this question, which caused unpleasantness between the two Houses at the last session? As far as I am concerned, I wish to deal in practical legislation, and not engage in discussion about abstract matters of privilege between the two Houses. Let us take up the post-route bill just sent to us, pass it, and send it back to the House; and, if we deem it proper, amend it. Why raise this question of privilege between the Senate and the House? Nothing practically can result from it, in my opinion.

Mr. FERRY. I answer my colleague on the committee by saying that there are other matters besides the two that have been mentioned, namely the franking privilege and the Brazilian subsidy as it is called, or rather the proposition to establish a line between the United States and Brazil. There is the transportation question and there is the question of the rates of postage and that of the reclassification of mail matter, which are very important measures, deemed so by the Department.

Now, it seems to me that the surest and most direct method of arriving at an agreement upon any proposition on this bill is to appoint another committee of conference and test the House whether they are willing to meet the Senate upon the merits of the questions of disagreement now pending between the two Houses. It is with that view, and that seeming to be the most direct way, that instead of taking up the bill which now lies here merely covering post-routes, I have moved to appoint another conference committee, so as to test the House. If upon making the attempt it is found that they are unwilling to consider the merits of the question, the conference committee can report to the Senate, and the Senate can take such action as it deems proper.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say one word in relation to this latter bill that came from the House, and I think that is a matter to which the Senate ought to give its attention.

We have here to-day a bill embracing a variety of subjects. It is first called a post-route bill, and then there are added to it sundry other matters, and all of those matters have received the favorable action of the Senate. It went to the House. The House refused to consider it and returned the bill to us. We have therefore now before us the original post-route bill of the House, to which the Senate made its amendments; and now, while the bill is in conference and while it is pending between the two Houses on the disagreeing votes, the House deliberately extracts from that bill a part of it in the very words in which it stands in this bill and incorporates that part into a new bill, passes it in the House, and sends it up to us.

I hold that that is improperly here, and whenever we can get at that bill I shall submit a motion to return it to the House. We can do no other way and maintain our own self-respect. What becomes of your committees of conference? Here is a bill as to which we solemnly believe and record our votes that a certain thing should be done, and we amend it accordingly, and we return it to the House with those amendments. A committee of conference is appointed, and then, to avoid voting upon what the Senate believes right and just and which may affect all of the States, the House simply takes their original bill and re-enacts it and sends it to us. This is unparliamentary; it is disrespectful to this body; and I think there can be in all the history of this Government found but one example like it, and in that case the Senate refused to act upon the bill that was sent to it.

There is therefore no way out of this matter that I can see but to take up this bill and act upon it in a sensible way, and invite the attention of the House to the consideration of it; and as the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has suggested, there have been such intimations made to him as lead him to believe that a result may come out of our present difficulty, but never in propriety can we take a bill which is a part of the bill upon which we have acted when it has gone to a conference and consider it here subsequent to the action which we had on the original bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. Is there objection to this subject being finished?

Mr. WHYTE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. FERRY. I move that all prior orders be laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves that the pending and all prior orders be laid aside for the further consideration of this conference report.

Mr. FERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays to test the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg the Chair to state the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is whether the pending and all prior orders shall be laid aside in order that the Senate may now dispose of the conference report on the post-route bill.

Mr. BLAINE. One single moment, although it may not be in order. I apprehend from what is said by the chairman of the Post-Office Committee that there is no intention of debating it. It is not to occupy time. It is a mere question as to whether the Senate will order a new conference.

Mr. WHYTE. It will occupy a good deal of time.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then let us have it now.

Mr. BLAINE. We might as well take the time now as at any other period. It need not occupy time.

Mr. MATTHEWS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.] I therefore decline to vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 22; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference and grant a new conference?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I desire to say but a word to the Senate upon the question involved in the adoption of the report of the committee of conference. I did hope when the Nestor of the Senate announced to the Senate that this question involved the dignity of this body, that he intended to stand upon that dignity and repel the insinuation of the House that we were not conscious when we were violating the Constitution. I did hope that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] would arouse that spirit in this body which would compel us to stand upon our rights, and to feel that we had been treated with indignity by the other branch of Congress; but I was sorry to find before the distinguished Senator from Maine concluded his remarks that he was disposed to treat again with the House upon a subject which involved our dignity. I was sorry to find him willing to consent to a committee of conference when we had reached a point in the interviews between the two Houses when our dignity forbade any further discussion of the subject between the two branches of Congress.

The House of Representatives sent us a post-route bill in the ordinary course of legislation. The Senate attached to that bill various amendments, one of which revived the franking privilege; another introduced some different rule in regard to books in the mail; and another contained a donation to one John Roach, of Chester, Pennsylvania, for doing us the honor to fly the American flag. Those amendments were sent to the House of Representatives. They refused to accede to them. A committee of conference was the result. A conference was had. The conferees disagreed and so reported to the Senate. The Senate appointed a second committee of conference. That committee met a committee of like character from the House. They had no discussion of the amendments at all. No effort was made to reconcile the disagreements between the two branches of Congress. No discussion in regard to the different views which prevailed in the two branches was had—nothing whatever looking to a settlement of these controversies and the passage of a bill which would be a reconciliation of the disagreement.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. Having been a member of the conference committee, I would inform the Senator from Maryland that the conferees on the part of the Senate were not only desirous of considering the merits of the amendments and the bill, but insisted upon it; and there was discussion upon the merits generally and specifically. But the House conferees took the ground, as stated in their report, that they were unwilling then to consider and act upon the merits of the bill and the amendments.

As I stated before, if the Senator will allow me a word or two more, my only object now was to secure an agreement, having understood that the House perhaps might be disposed at this day of the session to consider the merits of the bill and amendments inasmuch as they include matters of importance to the country. I thought perhaps the most direct, effectual, and early method of reaching an agreement would be by another conference, and the fact of two conferences having been appointed does not prevent the appointment of a third or a fourth or a fifth, if by repeated conferences an agreement can finally be had between the two Houses.

Mr. WHYTE. I am much obliged to the Senator from Michigan, as I am to all Senators for any light that can be thrown on a subject under discussion; but I was speaking from the record, and I insist that according to the record there was no official discussion of this question of disagreement between the two Houses. What conversation took place between the individual members, of course I know nothing of; that belongs to the breasts of the gentlemen who composed the conference committee from the two Houses. I speak of the Journal; I speak of what appears upon the face of the public papers; and I assert that according to the report of the conference committee there was no discussion in regard to the special amendments about which it was supposed there was disagreement. On the contrary, the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate were met in limine by the barrier to discussion of those special measures by the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives. They were told at the outset: "We cannot entertain with you any discussion as to the merits of your amendments, as to whether they will promote the commerce of the country or be beneficial to the people or not. The merits of your amendments cannot be inquired into. We meet you at the outset with a resolution of the House of Representatives which tells you that by your amendments, or some of them, you have infringed their right under the Constitution. You have interfered with their power to originate revenue measures, and therefore it is not a subject open for discussion between the two Houses, involving as it does the dignity of the House of Representatives."

What is the use of talking about a conference when that is the answer made to our proposal for consideration, for discussion of these amendments? Why should we go down upon our knees and beg the House of Representatives to give us audience? Why should we, when they send back to our table here with discourtesy our amendments to their bill and tell us "We want no consideration of your amendments; we do not mean to consider them; you have violated our rights; you have put amendments on a bill that you had no right to put upon it, and we send it back and tell you to read your Constitution to learn the powers which belong to the Senate; confine yourselves to the strict limits set for your legislative duties"—why should we propose to confer with them further?

Mr. PADDOCK. In view of the fact just stated by the Senator from Maryland, I would like to call his attention to this other fact, that it is shown by the record that this bill as sent to the House was not read at all in the House. The House itself could not take knowledge of the fact that there was any such attempt on the part of the Senate to infringe its rights. The bill was not at all considered in the House, was not read even by its title. It was assumed that there was something in the bill which the House might not agree to, and therefore arbitrarily they adopted this resolution and sent it back to the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. I thank my friend from Nebraska for that suggestion. It only shows you how strong was the feeling in the House when they would not allow the bill to be read, even with its amendments, by the Clerk at the table.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland if he considers that to be due courtesy and propriety on the part of the House in the consideration of a matter sent to it from the Senate?

Mr. WHYTE. On the contrary, I am standing up for the dignity of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. And that is all the question there is before the Senate to-day.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly it is, and we ought to stand on our dignity and not allow the House to treat us in this way; let their bill lie forever on that table.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me a moment? The Senator stated, I think, that in the conference committee, as far as the record disclosed, there had been no discussion upon the merits of the bill. Of course the discussion does not appear, neither does it appear in the record of any conference committee; the results are merely submitted to the respective Houses. Now, as corroborative of what I stated I call the Senator's attention to the report, which says:

> The conferees upon the part of the Senate proposed to waive all discussion as to the questions of privilege at issue between the two Houses, and to take up the House bill No. 4286, with the Senate amendments thereto, and consider them, for the purpose of making a report upon the several matters embraced therein.

Showing by the report on the part of the conferees of the Senate a disposition on their part to waive the question of privilege and take a vote on the merits of the amendments to the bill. So I think upon the record, the Senator's attention being called to it, it appears that the Senate through its committee was disposed to consider the merits of the bill and amendments and waive the question of privilege between the two Houses.

Mr. WHYTE. Why, Mr. President, I did not say a word about the Senate branch of the committee of conference. On the contrary, I have no doubt they did everything in their power to induce the managers on the part of the House to look at the question; but they refused to look at it at all. That was what I said. I am not corrected at all. The Senator only confirms me in what I have already asserted. Now, what did the managers on the part of the House say to the managers on the part of the Senate?

> The conferees upon the part of the House decline to agree to the proposition.

It is perfectly true that the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate did all in their power to induce the managers on the part of the House to listen to reason, to hear argument.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me one word?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. I happened myself to be upon the last conference committee. There was a disposition on the part at least of two of the House conferees to consider the bill upon its merits, but they felt themselves precluded from doing so because of the resolution of the House. The House itself never having considered the question at all in any of its aspects, its resolution precluded them absolutely from considering any branch of the question.

Mr. WHYTE. Now, Mr. President, all this testimony, which I knew nothing about, which is being furnished by the managers on the part of the Senate in that conference, is only confirming what I have said, that in another conference committee no managers appointed upon the part of the House, with the resolution of the House standing not reconsidered and standing as the law for their guidance, can discuss this subject.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to gain some information from him? I have listened with some surprise to the statements of what took place in the House as to refusing to hear the bill read and so on. I am not one of the members of this body especially tender-footed about referring to what goes on in the House. If I were I should submit to the Chair and to at least two Senators that the Senate has a right to know and to know only what the House says to us, namely whether it agrees or disagrees to our amendments, but it has no right to know what they refused to do in the House or what the other incidental proceedings may have been, or as my friend from California [Mr. SARGENT] naturally adds what is done by conference committees except so far as the report made to the Senate shows?

However, waiving all that, I understand the Senator from Maryland to address a very earnest and lucid argument to the point that the House having refused on the ground of its own privilege to consider the amendments of the Senate, thereby it becomes, even improper I think he argues, certainly not worth while, for the Senate to propose a further conference. Now, I inquire of the Senator from Maryland in what respect this case differs from the very numerous cases during my term in the Senate in which conference committee after conference committee has been appointed on this very topic, namely, the privileges of the two Houses. I remember that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] who a moment ago was in his seat—he is not now—was one of the managers on the part of the House on an occasion when as one of the managers on the part of the Senate I devoted not only days but nights to an attempt to agree upon a report which should settle that a certain bill was not a money bill within the meaning of the parliamentary law, the House having in that case in very strenuous language denied that the Senate had any right whatever over the subject which it had assumed, and conference committee after conference committee was appointed, and the then Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Scott, made at last a report, a very elaborate and able report, on that subject.

If my friend from Maryland is right, if I understand him, all that was quite outside the purpose, if not beneath the dignity of the Senate, the House having risen with some animation and said that it declined to consider at all amendments or a bill which had been passed by the Senate because the legislation was in the nature of a money bill, as they say in the British Parliament, a bill for raising revenue as the Constitution of the United States says, the whole matter was a usurpation on the part of the Senate, they would not entertain any such thing. That is what they said then; that is what they have said several other times; and it is to reconcile that difference between the two Houses, to come to an agreement so that the two Houses may be at one, that conference committees are appointed, not only in such cases, but in all cases whatsoever of a difference between the two Houses; and the parliamentary law, like the rules of the Senate, incessantly enjoins upon us to remember that the duty of two parliamentary bodies is to come together if they can, and therefore a motion to concur always takes precedence of a motion to adhere, and every motion and every step tending to bring the two Houses together is preferentially considered as against every motion tending to leave the two Houses apart.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is kind enough to hand me the report, to which I venture to draw the attention of the Senator from Maryland. It is dated the 2d of March, 1871:

Mr. Scott, from the committee of conference appointed by the two Houses to consider the question as to the power of the Senate to originate the bill (S. No. 1083) to repeal so much of the act approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes and for other purposes," as continues the income tax after the 31st day of December, 1869, submitted the following report.

And then follows an argument which I venture to say in the absence of its author might be read by every Senator who has forgotten it with instruction and with profit, because it presents with great ability and in very lucid terms the law on this subject. There is an instance, and I ask the Senator from Maryland why it is that in this case the same proceeding, so customary, here falls so far below the dignity of the Senate or else so entirely beside the ordinary purpose and custom of our action?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, if I have failed to incite any enthusiasm on the part of the distinguished Senator from New York toward the preservation of the dignity of this body, I must confess that I have been certainly very remiss in the effort to make myself understood. I do not know that it is within my power to explain satisfactorily to the Senator from New York the distinction between the class of cases to which he refers and this particular case; but it strikes me that this case presents a very different one from any he has had to deal with in this body since he has been a member of it. Every parliamentarian who has spent any portion of his life in almost any legislative body I presume understands the object and the necessity of conferences. Everybody knows that a committee of conference is a parliamentary device to reconcile disagreements between two branches of a legislature. Everybody knows that when a conference committee is appointed, it is appointed for the purpose of discussing the question involved by the amendment which has been put upon a bill in either House. Conferences of that character are always favored; there may be one, two, three, four, or five, the last being, as they are called in parliamentary bodies, full and free conferences, giving the widest latitude to the managers on the part of either House, so that there may be some reconciliation of conflicting view and a law be the outcome of the discussion in the two branches. I understand that, and I understand perfectly the question which was involved and which was decided by the Senate under that report made by the Senator from Penhsylvania, [Mr. Scott.] In that case a bill originated in this body; it was taken up in the Senate and passed here. It was sent to the House, discussed in the House; it was considered in the House; and the House took the ground that it was a revenue measure, and ought to have originated in that body, and the House appointed a committee to discuss that question with a conference committee on the part of the Senate. The disagreement there was upon a bill considered in both Houses; considered here where it originated and found its form and first existence; considered in the House, deliberately considered; the point made that it was a revenue measure, the point discussed, and it then sent back here, the House making that point for the Senate to discuss; the Senate appointed a committee of conference, the House a committee, and they discussed it thoroughly because that was the disagreement upon the bill.

Now, if the Senator from New York who asked me a question will allow me to answer it in his hearing, I will show him—and his aptness, I think, to appreciate a distinction will in this case come to my aid—the distinction between this case and any other case of conference with which he has had to deal.

This bill came from the House proposing a vast number of new post-routes. The Senate considered it. The Senate made sundry amendments as to post-routes; it added an amendment in regard to the franking privilege; it added an amendment in regard to the postage upon books; it added an amendment in the nature of a subsidy to the Brazilian steamship line of John Roach. Those two amendments with the bill went back to the House of Representatives. Now, I ask my friend to give me his entire attention.

Mr. CONKLING. I hear every word the Senator says.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator possesses the power of reading and hearing at the same time probably, but I want to call his attention to this particular point. When the bill went back to the House and was taken up for consideration by the House, the House refused to consider these amendments at all. The House did not consider them at all. The House refused to inquire whether they were for the good of the people, whether it would conduce to the honor and the glory of our country to subsidize this line or not. The merits of the amendments never came into discussion, never were considered by the House at all. The subject was never, therefore, in the deliberation of the House of Representatives at all, not even for a moment. On the contrary, without considering the amendments, refusing to concur in them, sending them back to us, thereby making the basis on which should arise a committee of conference between the two Houses, the House took the bill in solido, without reading the amendments, and by a solemn resolution, passed by a majority of its members, returned the bill to the Senate with this declaration; this is the resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 4286, to establish post-roads in the several States herein named, with the Senate amendments thereto, be returned to the Senate, as a part of said amendments are in the nature of and constitute a revenue bill.

Therefore they did not consider the amendments, and to-day not one manager in this Senate can rise in his place and point out which one of our amendments the House disagreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the honorable Senator reach the time when it is proper for me to ask him whether that is the distinction on which he insists? He has stated it very clearly, and I perceive his point. Is that the distinction which he says should prevail?

Mr. WHYTE. That is one of them. If my friend from New York will allow me to get through, I will give him another.

Mr. CONKLING. Of course I will allow the Senator to permit me to speak when he concludes; but if it be agreeable to him I should like at this point, as to that distinction which he has stated, to show him, if I can, that if the cases differ, the difference is in favor of the Senate in this instance, not against the Senate, in favor I mean of proceeding to a conference and not of refusing it. But if I incommode the Senator, I shall not proceed.

Mr. WHYTE. Not at all. I will hear the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I remind the Senator from Maryland that in the case of the income tax the action of the House, as I will read it to him, was exactly the action of the House in this case as he has read it to the Senate. I read now from the report submitted by Mr. Hooper, one of the managers on the part of the House:

On the 26th of January, 1871, the Senate passed a bill (S. 1083)—

In reference to the income tax.

Believing this bill, thus originating in the Senate, to be one which the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution required to originate in the House of Representatives, and therefore an invasion of the privileges of the House, when it came over from the Senate on January 27, 1871, the House immediately adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate bill (S. 1083) "to repeal so much of the act approved July 14, 1870, entitled 'An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes,' as continues the income tax after the 31st day of December, A. D., 1869," be returned to that body with the respectful suggestion on the part of the House that section 7, article 1, of the Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the sole power to originate such measures.

The action of the House in this case was the imitation of the action of the House there. Doubtless whoever drew that resolution took this or some other customary form which has become by use stereotyped for such occasions. Thus there is no distinction so far; but the Senator from Maryland will say, because he is too astute ever to forget to say what properly belongs to his case, that he points out to me that here is not a bill originated by the Senate as in the instance of the income tax, but a bill originated by the House which the Senate has proceeded to amend. I insist upon that distinction because it carries back the mind of the Senator and of myself to the source of all these distinctions and the great volume of instructions upon them; it carries us back to the practice of that Parliament which existing for eight hundred years has by precedent made up that body of practice called the parliamentary law. By the constitution of England, unwritten but exact in that regard at least as it is, money bills were always committed exclusively to the Commons. It was said that the Crown could lay no taxes in England, that taxes so called or revennes were the voluntary tribute, the chosen rendition of the subjects of the British Crown; and therefore philosophically the Commons, and never the Lords, could raise revenue or impose taxes. But even with that special reason growing out of the circumstance that England was a monarchy with all its intendments, there came very early to exist in the British Parliament, before our fathers wrote our Constitution, this understanding:

> That all aids and supplies * * * * * ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed by the House of Lords.

There was the understanding entered upon the orders of the two Houses of Parliament, very early fixing a rule at least as stringent as the Constitution ordains, and yet long, long ago and ever since it was held in the British Lords that the Lords could amend money bills, those bills having originated in the Commons and come up to the Lords.

Now, then, apply that distinction to this case. The House originated this bill. It came to the Senate for treatment. The Senate was summoned to act upon it. The Senate did act upon it. The Senate amended it, not proceeding to the assertion of any prerogative so radical as that which was asserted when we originated a bill to repeal the income tax, and thus standing within narrow limits, standing within more confessed rights in this instance, the Senate proceeded to amend a bill sent here from the House. Upon our amendments being returned the House readopted in substance the resolution which I have read to the Senator adopted in the case of the income tax.

I stop to ask of the Senator and of the Senate, is there a distinction? None I conceive which the Senator has pointed out except that not only the House but the Senate has found a case now in which the elements of disagreement are fewer and narrower than they were in the case of the income tax, because here according to the understanding of the House the bill has originated where it should have done, and all the Senate has done is to attempt to amend it; and thus in place of having the whole broad question dividing the two Houses, it presents itself only in respect of one narrow application of it. So that I submit to the honorable Senator from Maryland this case, more than the case of the income tax, is that case which the parliamentary law speaks to when it says, that so long as it is possible to reconcile and compose differences between the two Houses, and especially touching questions of the respective rights of the Houses, neither House should desist from the effort to bring the two Houses together.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Maryland replies to the Senator from New York, I desire to call his attention to one fact instead of interrupting him again. I desire to ask him if it is not true that in regard to all the great appropriation bills it is the usage of the House, when they go down with the Senate amendments, sometimes hundreds in number, to at once, without reading or commitment, vote to nonconcur in the amendments in a lump, and ask for a committee of conference?

Now the point of this question is this: I understand the Senator says that he knows somehow that the House has been guilty of a discourtesy to the Senate in refusing to read our amendments to this bill, and pronouncing a certain opinion in regard to them, and asking a committee of conference. I ask him if that is not almost the uniform custom in the House in regard to the great appropriation bills when they come up late in the session?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, Mr. President, I answer the Senator from Massachusetts promptly, that is the uniform custom, but it was "more honored in the breach" upon this occasion "than in the observance," for they did not vote not to concur and ask for a committee of conference; on the contrary, they did not consider the amendments at all, but refused peremptorily to consider them, and sent the bill back to us to eliminate our unconstitutional amendments before we should again send it back to them. That was the action of the House.

Mr. HOAR. My question was not whether the custom was not to concur, but whether the custom was not to read but to ask a committee of conference without reading or consideration. His point I understand is, not that we should not confer with the House because the House maintains a certain privilege, but that we will not concur with the House in regard to that privilege if it has declared its opinion before it reads the bill or amendments. My question to him is, if he does not know that in regard to all the great appropriation bills the House declares its non-concurrence before it reads the bill?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I made no such fine point as that. I made the point that the House of Representatives met our amendments with a formal resolution. I do not know except from what I am informed by the Senator from Nebraska whether they read the amendments or not. He has stated that they did not read them. But I say they did not act upon them; they did not vote upon them; the record shows that they sent them back to us as not worthy of their consideration because they violated the constitutional privileges of that body. That is what I say.

Now, the Senator from New York does not, in my judgment, answer me by reading the resolution adopted by the House in 1871. The Senator from New York begs the question when he presents that resolution on that revenue bill as an answer to my objection. That resolution passed on the revenue bill was a direct invitation to the Senate to treat with the House upon the subject, and when the Senate determined to treat with the House and appointed its committee of conference and the House responded, the House took the pains to say in its responsive resolution that it did so merely out of courtesy to the Senate, the House reserving its right. Now look what the resolution was—and it is not copied verbatim——

Mr. CONKLING. I did not say it was copied verbatim.

Mr. WHYTE. On the contrary, the milk is left entirely out of the cocoanut in this resolution. The first resolution makes a respectful suggestion to the Senate to consider whether inadvertently, whether, as I am sorry to say too often is the case in this body, we are passing the compliments of the season and so agreeably in social life that sometimes bills slip through here without our knowing anything as to what they are unless the lynx eye of the Senator from Vermont is put upon them, and then he wakes us up every now and then with an objection; but when he goes out, God help the people! [Laughter.] The resolution of the House in regard to that bill which originated in the Senate, Mr. President, you will see, embodies these words which my friend from New York cannot find in the resolution now before us in this report of the committee of conference:

> Resolved, That the Senate bill (S. No. 1083) "to repeal so much of the act approved July 14, 1870, entitled 'An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes,' as continues the income tax after the 31st day of December, A. D. 1869," be returned to that body, with the respectful suggestion on the part of the House that section 7, article 1, of the Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the sole power to originate such measures.

Said the House respectfully, with the proper dignity which became that body in addressing its colleagues in this branch of the legislature, "Allow me to suggest that in some moment of excitement in the Senate or in the cloak-rooms, this bill has passed your body; we respectfully suggest to you to give it a new consideration and to bear in mind, though we tell you so respectfully, that you are infringing upon the privileges of this co-ordinate branch of the legislature."

Mr. CONKLING. I infer that the Senator lays stress on the word "respectful."

Mr. WHYTE. "Respectful" is a very proper word, and I admire it wherever I meet with it, more especially when it comes from the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. But the Senator emphasizes it in such a way that I infer it cuts a large figure.

Mr. WHYTE. It does cut a large figure, because when a man respectfully suggests a thing to you and does not do it as a bully you consider it, while on the other hand if it is presented to you as a suggestion with clinched fists and shaking head you are very apt to stand upon your dignity. Now I want to see the Senator from New York stand upon his dignity when the House has not respectfully suggested to us that this bill infringes its right.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the House put on the gloves?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly. I was going to say when the Senator from New York interrupted me, and no man better understands than he does what it is to have the gloves on and to be ready for the fray [laughter]—I was going to say that the resolution came with the bill to the Senate. The Senate then asked for a committee of conference on the resolution, with which the House at once complied as a courtesy, the question involved being the privilege of the House. That is not this case.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. WHYTE. I am afraid the Senate will come to the conclusion that I want to occupy the whole day; but they will see that I am only making detached remarks and injected sentences in the midst of others' speeches. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY. I was about to suggest to the Senator from Maryland that his remarks involve a wider scope than it was my intention by the motion I offered to open.

Mr. WHYTE. That is exactly what I thought. I thought it was a much wider question and so suggested to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] when he said it would only take a moment or two.

Mr. FERRY. For that reason I recall the attention of the Senator from Maryland to the report.

Mr. BLAINE. I said it only need take a moment.

Mr. FERRY. The report simply declares the fact that the two Houses cannot agree; that their conferees "have met, and, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree touching the matters of difference between the two Houses indicated by said House resolution."

Accompanying this is the statement on the part of the conferees of the Senate that they were disposed to waive the question of privilege raised on the part of the House and desired to discuss and act upon the merits of the bill and amendments. The House conferees indicated on their part that unless the resolution could be enlarged in its scope they had not the power to discuss the question of the merits of the bill and amendments.

Now, I say the question before the Senate is simply the adoption of the report, to wit, the fact that the conferees disagreed upon that resolution. If the Senator had observed the resolution I offered he would have seen that it asks simply that the Senate adopt this fact expressed in these few words with the explanation of the respective conferees, and that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill and ask for another committee of conference. I cannot understand how the Senate can reach the question otherwise. And I did not intend, neither do I intend now, to raise the question of privilege between the two Houses. The Senator from Maryland has addressed all of his remarks, or substantially all, to the question of privilege, which, I think, is not the question now before the Senate. It is simply the question of the adoption of the report, merely declaring what the conferees came to—that they disagreed.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. With the consent of the Senator from Maryland, will the Senator from Michigan allow me to ask him a question, really for information?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. The House passed this resolution:

Resolved, That House bill No. 4286, to establish post-roads in the several States herein named, with the Senate amendments thereto, be returned to the Senate, as a part of said amendments are in the nature of and constitute a revenue bill.

And in the conference report the conferees both of the House and Senate say that "the conferees upon the part of the House decline to agree to the proposition" of the Senate to waive those things, because they "do not, in their opinion, possess any power under the resolution of the House to consider the bill or amendments without an enlargement thereof."

Now, as that resolution of the House still stands, and as the conferees on the part of the House, with that resolution still standing, deny that they have any power to confer with the Senate upon anything that contravenes that resolution, what good can a new committee of conference do, meeting the House conferees limited as they are by that resolution? That is the first branch of my question and the other is this: ought we not, in view of that resolution, if we desire to go on at all, respectfully request the House to reconsider the resolution they have passed and indicate a desire for a further conference, so that that conference may be free and full, as they are embarrassed by such a resolution?

Mr. FERRY. I answer the Senator from Kentucky by this statement: a resolution on the part of the House does not bind the Senate; the House takes its own course of expression, and it has been stated here—I have not stated it, but the Senator from Maryland has seen fit to state that the House was in the attitude of clinching its fists and shaking its head——

Mr. WHYTE. Oh, no; it was the Senator from New York who suggested that, and I merely accepted it.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh no; I decline the compliment entirely.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Maryland alluded I think to the Senator from New York as perhaps in that attitude toward the Senator from Maryland, but he followed that by stating that the course of the House put them in that attitude. That was substantially the remark of the Senator from Maryland, and I would say to him in passing that I do not know, on the principle upon which he criticised the conference committee, how he has a right here to step outside of the record and say that the House put itself in that attitude of clinching its fists and shaking its head at the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend——

Mr. FERRY. I desire to answer the Senator from Kentucky, and then I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WHYTE. I want the floor after the Senator from Michigan. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRY. The Senate have observed that I have taken but very little time on this question, and I desire the attention of the Senate to this point, that my object is to reach the second question put by the Senator from Kentucky. Since the House have, without reading the amendments proposed to the bill by the Senate, sent it back with this restricted resolution, and two conference committees have attempted to reconcile the two Houses upon this resolution and they report that they have disagreed, and the Senate is now asked to concur in that report, with the expression of the cause of disagreement on the part of the respective Houses, namely, that the House conferees consider the resolution too narrow in its scope to cover the merits of the question, and those on the part of the Senate have shown a disposition all through to consider the merits, as the record discloses, I now, following out the suggestion of the conferees on the part of the Senate, ask that this report be adopted, and that then a new committee of conference be appointed on the merits of the question, we insisting upon our amendments. That, I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, will bring the point at issue to the notice of the House of Representatives. Then, if the House with a better temper than that in which it passed the resolution shall waive its resolution and meet us in a conference on the merits of the question, I think we shall be able to settle the whole matter and arrange the bill satisfactorily.

Mr. BECK. What I desired more particularly from the Senator from Michigan was to know whether it is not indispensable before we appoint a new committee of conference to disembarrass it by asking the House to remove or repeal the resolution they have already adopted, so that they too may appoint conferees who may consult with the Senate fully, freely, and fairly, without embarrassment? So long as that resolution remains no conference can be appointed on the part of the House who can consider the question. Is it not, therefore, preliminary to the appointment of any new conferees that we should ascertain whether the House will or will not rescind the resolution, for if it does not, no conference can be had?

Mr. FERRY. I remind the Senator from Kentucky, who has great knowledge of parliamentary law, that the only method by which the two Houses can meet each other on questions of difference is through conference committees, and it seems to me it would be a reflection on the House if the Senate should pass a resolution asking the House to modify a resolution it had passed as a deliberative body. The object of the conference committee now asked is to reach that very question, and to suggest in this indirect method the will of the Senate and the disposition of the Senate, inviting the House to modify that resolution so far as to waive it and meet us with a committee of conference on the merits of the questions.

The Senate through its conferees has been disposed all along to consider the merits of the amendments, reject such as the House disagreed to if in their judgment they thought it wise to do so; and yet the House conferees have stood upon the resolution, saying that the resolution narrowed them down and they had no authority to travel beyond its bounds. Viewing it in that light the conference committee deemed it its duty to report the disagreement and ask for a further conference committee, that the House might under a different resolution and with a wider scope meet us upon the question of the merits.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. I ask my friend from Maryland to allow me to put a parliamentary question to the Chair. I do not wish to speak at all. Would it be in order pending the question now before the Senate to move that the Senate recede from any of the amendments it made to the bill? I think it would be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DAWES in the chair.) The present occupant of the chair is inclined to think it would be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that will not be decided in a hurry. You cannot do it.

Mr. FERRY. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it would hardly be in place to move to recede from the amendments when a report is pending declaring that the conference committee disagree. They do not disagree upon the merits, but simply upon the resolution of the House raising the question of privilege.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the Senate can unlock this difficulty whenever it sees fit. However, I will not take time now as the Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. WHYTE. I was about concluding my remarks when the Senator from New York interrupted me. My friend the Senator from Kentucky has called the attention of the Senate to the answer made on the part of the conferees of the House. The Senator from Michigan is in error when he supposes that the House desires to enlarge the power of the managers on the part of the House. When the proposition was made to consider these different amendments with a view to a reconciliation of the differences, the conferees on the part of the House "declined to agree to this proposition for the reason that they do not, in their opinion, possess any power under the resolution of the House to consider the bill or amendments without an enlargement thereof."

Now, Mr. President—and I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to this branch of this case if he takes any interest in the question—the Senator from Michigan stated that the conference committee had indicated that they could not consider these different amendments in the absence of an enlargement of their powers by a change of the form of the resolution under which the House was then acting, and the Senator from Michigan led us to believe that there was a hope in that direction by the statement which he made. Now, so far from it, an effort was made in the House of Representatives on the same day, June 18, 1878, on which this report was made to the Senate. The managers on the part of the House made their report, and Mr. WADDELL, representing those managers, asked for a suspension of the rules that he might offer this resolution:

Resolved, That in accordance with the suggestion of the conference committee just read, a conference committee be appointed with power to consider the Senate amendments to House bill No. 4286 as though the same had been disagreed to by the House—

Putting it in the position of the cases to which the Senator from New York referred—as though the same had been disagreed to by the House, and that the Senate be requested to appoint a like committee for the same purpose.

Mr. CARLISLE made the point of order that the said resolution was not in order, for the reason that it was not competent for the House, even by a suspension of the rules, to empower a committee of conference to consider and report upon any matter except such as the two Houses had actually disagreed upon; that the Journal showed that the House had never disagreed to the Senate amendments to the said bill, but had refused to consider them because in the opinion of the House they involved an invasion of its constitutional privileges, and that therefore the only matter which the committee of conference could be authorized to consider and report upon was the question of privilege now pending between the two Houses.

By unanimous consent, the said point of order was waived, and the question being put on the motion of Mr. WADDELL to suspend the rules, the same was not agreed to, (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.)

So the rules were not suspended to enable him to get an enlargement of that power. The vote stood on that 130 to 99, with 62 absentees.

Then, Mr. President, understanding that we have had two conferences, that both of these conferences have ended exactly in the same way, the managers on the part of the Senate being met by the managers on the part of the House with the resolution of the House that they could not consider these amendments at all because they were acting under direction of the House by a deliberate resolution, where is there any hope or expectation, where is there any call upon us in the discharge of public duty to send back again to the House and appeal to them as a matter of courtesy to us to waive the question of privilege which they have raised in their own branch? I submit, Mr. President, that we have done all that it behooves us to do in the interest of proper legislation by having had two conferences upon this subject, and it is now for the House to make the first movement toward a reconciliation of the differences between the two branches of Congress.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I inquired of the Chair whether it be in order to submit a motion to recede from any of these amendments, and I did not hear whether the Chair decided that question or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it is always in order to put such a motion as will bring the two Houses together.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let the Senator submit his motion in writing, so that the matter can be discussed and the sense of the Senate taken upon it.

Mr. THURMAN. I think I shall get rid of all trouble of that kind. Is the motion now pending in writing?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The SECRETARY. The pending resolution is:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the second report of the committee of conference made by Mr. KIRKWOOD, June 18, 1878, insist upon its amendments to the bill, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. THURMAN. So far as that resolution asks the Senate to agree to that report, I do not know what there is for the Senate to agree to. The report states the fact that the conference committee could not agree, and I do not know that it is necessary for us to affirm that they could not agree when they tell us that they could not agree. But that is not material. I move now to amend that resolution by adding:

And that the conferees on the part of the Senate be instructed to recede from the Senate amendment to the bill, relating to the franking privilege, contained in the proviso to the eleventh section of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be reduced to writing, and then we shall see what it is.

Mr. THURMAN. I will reduce it to writing in a moment. [A pause.] My amendment to the resolution is this:

And that the conferees to be appointed on the part of the Senate be instructed to recede from the Senate amendment in relation to the franking privilege added to the eleventh section of the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I want to know whether that is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to have it reduced to writing and read at the desk, and then we shall see how the whole thing will read.

I want to make a suggestion while the Senator is reducing it to writing. As this involves difficult questions of order and proper procedure perhaps, as well as the constitutional question, I wish to make the suggestion that the subject be referred to a select committee of five Senators, composed of the gentlemen who have given attention to this subject, my honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and some other Senator to consider, so that quietly they can endeavor to disentangle this knot; see, first, what there is in the claim of the other branch of Congress in respect of this constitutional question of privilege, and also what the Senate ought to do about it, not only in respect to the substance of the thing itself, but to the proper mode of relieving the difficulty; and if I do not interfere with anybody, I will make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Vermont that the whole subject-matter be referred to a select committee of five.

Mr. FERRY. I do not want to antagonize the Senator from Vermont on that proposition, but it seems to me that the simplest method is to appoint another committee of conference to meet a similar one on the part of the House. I understand that it is the disposition of the House to meet the Senate and see whether we cannot agree.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope that is so, too. I sympathize very much with the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio. Am I taking him from the floor?

Mr. THURMAN. I had not quite done.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg pardon.

Mr. THURMAN. As I understand it, there are two amendments made by the Senate to that bill which give rise to this difficulty. I do not know that I am entirely right in that statement, but that is what I have understood. One is the amendments in regard to the franking privilege, and the other what is called the Brazilian subsidy. I believe those are the two amendments that give rise to this trouble. I would prefer very much at once to move to recede from the franking-privilege amendment. I am perhaps induced to that because I was opposed to that at the outset, and I think the Senate would do well to recede from it. But, it is said that would be out of order, that we have no bill before us, that the bill has gone to the other House, and that we must have the bill before us before we can recede. So it is said around me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the bill is in fact here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It must be, because the House declined to receive it, returned it to us, they declining to entertain it. But the difficulty, if my friend will pardon me——

Mr. THURMAN. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty that occurs to my mind is that the House having declined to receive or consider this bill thus amended, and having sent it back to us, it is here just as it stood the moment the amendments were agreed to, except that time has gone by. Here it is, although we have had conferences about it; but the conferences were not on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, which are the ordinary cases of conference, but they were conferences upon the question of whether the House ought to receive and entertain the amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand the Senator's point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being the state of the case, we are now beyond the period of reconsideration on the amendments that we agreed to; and if the bill, as I think it does, stands just as it did a week after the period of time or just as it would have stood if a motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to these amendments had been put and lost, then the question is whether the Senate (before the House has taken any action upon the amendments at all) can recede, that is reconsider and back out, except upon the ground that we are wrong in our constitutional right, the resolution stating that the Senate recedes because the House is right in saying that we have invaded its constitutional privileges. That is unquestionable because it merely takes it out as an irregularity.

Mr. THURMAN. The point of the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Ohio will allow me.

Mr. THURMAN. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. FERRY. Just at this point the Senator from Vermont has raised——

Mr. THURMAN. I think I understand it, it can be stated in one sentence, that until the House has disagreed to our amendments we cannot recede from them. That is all there is in it, and possibly that is right. I do not pretend to say but that that may be right; still, I think there ought to be some way to get out of this dead-lock between the two Houses, and I did suppose that we could get out of it by a direct motion to recede, but, no doubt for the reason stated by the Senator from New York, as is suggested by Senators around me who are very well versed in parliamentary law, that cannot be done, but the right way to do it is to instruct our conferees to agree to recede: and therefore I have proposed to amend the resolution in that particular, so far as the franking privilege is concerned. So far as the subsidy provision is concerned, I said nothing and do not intend to say anything.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should agree with the Senator from Ohio that his amendment to this resolution is perfectly in order, although the Senate of the United States decided in 1873 when what is called the salary grab was put on an appropriation bill, against my vote and whatever argument I could produce, that the Senate could not instruct its own committee of conference. I think that notion to be nonsense, and I am very glad to be able to vote for any proposition that will reverse it. But then comes the difficulty. Supposing that we all agree that it is in order to make this motion, and I think it is myself, and I should be very glad as I say to reverse the judgment of the Senate taken upon that other occasion, I am afraid the House of Representatives will say and will have a right to say that the instruction to recede implies a jurisdiction just as much as an instruction to insist; and therefore if they let us out on that ground that we recede from our amendments they have yielded the constitutional question they have stood upon, and so we should not get ahead. I am perfectly willing to try it, however.

Mr. FERRY. I think if the Senator from Ohio will reflect a moment he will see that it is necessary for the Senate to act upon this report. I have no disposition to embarrass the Senate in reaching the point indicated by the Senator from Ohio. I will therefore modify my motion by asking for the adoption of the report. Then I will move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for another conference. It will then be proper for the Senator from Ohio to move to recede, which motion has priority.

Mr. THURMAN. Move to adopt the report! What is there to adopt? The conferees have reported that they cannot agree. The committee of conference has made no recommendation. What is there to adopt?

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator is technical about the language of my motion I will move that the Senate agree to the report. The report must be disposed of in some way. The Senator cannot move to recede when the difference between the two Houses is not upon the merits of the question, because the Houses must differ through their conferees on that very question of the merits of the measure. The difference here between the two Houses is on the scope of the House resolution, the House conferees deeming that they have not scope enough under it to consider the merits of the bill and amendments, and the Senate on its part, through its conferees, believing that there is scope enough, and they desire to consider the amendments of the Senate seriatim. Upon that disagreement, reported here by the conference committee, the Senate should agree to the report, and then either insist upon its amendments or recede from them. If the Senator from Ohio desires to recede from any amendment or all the amendments, that motion will have priority, and if agreed to the Houses will then be brought together; but if, on the other hand, a majority of the Senate prefer to insist upon its amendments, there will be a disagreement requiring a committee of conference in order to agree. I have coupled the two in my motion; but if that will embarrass the Senate I will withdraw the motion and ask for an agreement on the report, intending to follow it up by a motion to insist on the amendments of the Senate and ask for another committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan modifies his motion as he has indicated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it reported as modified, so as to know exactly what it is we are called upon to vote on.

Mr. FERRY. I modify it so as to move that the Senate agree to the report indicated, and that the committee be discharged.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read from the desk, so as to know exactly what we have before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution as modified will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the second report of the committee of conference made by Mr. KIRKWOOD, June 18, 1878, and the committee be discharged.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not agree, and in that respect I differ from the Senator from Vermont, that it is at all competent to instruct a conference committee, and I think the Senate has decided properly when it refused to do so. A conference cannot be a full and a free conference, as the language of parliamentary law has it, if one side of it meets under instructions to do or not to do a thing which the other side of the conference is entirely at liberty to do.

It is a misnomer, it is a contradiction to say that a full and free conference can be a conference bound down by instructions. I agree with the Senator from Vermont that under any parliamentary law it is too late to recede from the amendment upon any question of discretion, excepting it be one affecting the privilege of either House; but, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Ohio, if it does trench upon the privilege of either House, then of course it is competent at any time to recede from it.

I have certain views about this question which probably were derived from long service in the House. I have observed that the zeal of gentlemen who have served in the House and who have stood with great particularity and great emphasis for the privileges of the House seems to die out a little when they get in the Senate. I am going to prove an exception to that. I believe frankly that the two portions of this bill do infringe the privileges of the House. I believe we have no right to change the duties on imported books. I believe we have no right to change the revenues of the Post-Office Department by declaring that that which has heretofore paid postage shall not pay postage hereafter. If I were to put what I think in a resolution I should put it in about this form, as the Senator from Vermont insists on having everything in writing:

Resolved, That the amendments of the Senate to the pending bill changing the rate of duties on imported books and affecting the revenues of the Government by declaring certain mail matter free which now pays postage, being in the judgment of the House—

I will put it delicately for the nerves of the Senators—an infringement on the constitutional rights of that body, they are hereby withdrawn from the bill.

That seems to me to be entirely competent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is in order——

Mr. BLAINE. That is entirely competent, and I have so drawn it that we place it upon the judgment of the House, not asking any Senator to change his judgment; but it "being in the judgment of the House an infringement on the constitutional rights of that body."

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it is a surrender just the same.

Mr. SAULSBURY. How does the Senator from Maine derive the information that those are the particular points on which the House insist that there has been an infringement of their privileges? It has been rumored that those are the points, but I want to know whether there is any record on the files of the Senate to show that those are the particular points which the House deem to be an infringement of the privileges of that body?

Mr. BLAINE. They have objected that certain amendments did infringe, and I have included the two that seem to me justly chargeable with overstepping the powers of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as I understand we have no intimation on the part of the House as to the particular amendments of the Senate which they consider an infringement of their privileges. They have sent us a resolution declaring that they consider that we have trenched upon the prerogative of the House. What may have occurred between the managers of the conference between the two Houses I do not know. It may have been intimated there, but there is nothing on the files of the Senate to show what are the particular matters objected to by the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say to the honorable Senator from Delaware that if I should frame the resolution as I should desire it myself to be passed I would put it "in the judgment of the Senate," but thought that probably I might have some very sharp differences with gentlemen who know more about the privileges of the Senate than I do; and, therefore, I placed it on the other ground.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say, though it is not suggested by the remark of the Senator from Maine, that at the conclusion of a very memorable discussion between the two branches upon this general question of the extent of the constitutional prerogative of the House Mr. Webster declared it to be clear, in his judgment, that under the Constitution the House must be the final judge of the extent of its privilege.

Mr. BLAINE. Undoubtedly. I think the Senator from Massachusetts when a member of the House so maintained himself on a discussion of the funding bill.

Mr. HOAR. Therefore that opinion of Mr. Webster is a very high senatorial authority for the form suggested by the Senator from Maine in his resolution.

I wish to say one other thing in regard to this general question which arises every few years between the two branches. It is as capable of demonstration as any proposition, it seems to me, that upon the question between the two branches of comparative legislative power, under our parliamentary usages, the legislative power of the House is diminished by the assertion and the extension of this constitutional privilege on the part of the House, and the legislative power of the Senate is increased by the abandonment to the House of the exclusive power of originating this class of bills. Therefore if the Senate is seeking, as a good judge is said to seek, to enlarge its jurisdiction and to diminish the jurisdiction of the House, the Senate should decide all doubtful questions in favor of the claim of the House.

It is true that this power in the House to originate bills for raising revenue was suggested as a make-weight or equivalent in that branch to the large States for yielding the equality of representation in this body to the small States. But even then the wisest statesmen and the most experienced parliamentarians in the convention that framed the Constitution expressed the opinion that the privilege would be of no value to the House whatever. Mr. Madison declared that it was the result of the experience of the States which had a similar provision in their State constitutions that nothing of legislative power was gained to the popular branch, and that the claim only was a source of wrangling between the two branches. General Washington made upon this point the only speech which he made during the entire deliberations of the constitutional convention, and he declared in his speech that he was personally of opinion that the exclusive power of originating legislation upon revenue bills would not tend to increase the dignity or the power of the House in legislation, and he only assented to the proposition, representing as he did the large State of Virginia, in deference to the judgment of other delegates in the constitutional convention.

Mr. President, look at the question. The House of Representatives originates a revenue bill or one of the eleven great appropriation bills which we pass every winter. Under its rules such a bill must go to the Committee of the Whole, in which the freedom of debate and the power to offer amendments is absolutely unrestricted except that the House has power to limit debate by a vote, a power which is very charily exercised, before the House goes into committee. But there is no power to prevent the offering of amendments at the will of every member of that numerous body. In regard to every other subject-matter of legislation ordinarily in the House, the question who shall speak, the question how long that person shall speak, the question how long the debate shall continue, the question whether any amendments and what amendments shall be offered and voted upon, are in the absolute discretion of the organ of the committee that introduces the bill. The revenue and appropriation bills are an exception.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I want to understand his meaning. Shall I understand the Senator to say that under the rules of the House or in his apprehension an appropriation bill is a revenue bill?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; I did not say anything of that point at all. I am speaking of the parliamentary usages.

Mr. CONKLING. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I said in illustrating the kind of legislation which under the rules of the House was first considered in Committee of the Whole, the revenue bills and the great appropriation bills were the bills of that character. Practically the Senate has yielded to the House the claim, and I think without any constitutional warrant whatever, that the appropriation bills are revenue bills. At the time of the long struggle when General BANKS was elected Speaker of the House, which occupied a great part of the winter, the Senate undertook to save time by introducing some of the great appropriation bills, but the House refused to permit that to be done and insisted upon its prerogative.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Massachusetts does not mean to imply that appropriation bills are as exclusively within the power of the House as revenue bills?

Mr. HOAR. Not in the least, but I am speaking of the usage.

Mr. BLAINE. There is here no inhibition, for instance, upon appropriating money for any object the Senate sees fit and sending that down to the House; and it is the every-day practice.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that perfectly well. That is entirely foreign to the point which I was making. The point which I was endeavoring to make to the Senate is that under the parliamentary usage of Congress the extension of this claim of a right to originate revenue bills to appropriation bills or to all other matters of dispute, is an abridgement of the legislative power of the House and an increase of the legislative power of the Senate. If the Constitution were to enact affirmatively that revenue bills and appropriation bills should always first be introduced in the Senate, the legislative power of the Senate would be diminished and the legislative power of the House of Representatives would be enlarged by that constitutional change. That is the point I was making.

Now, how is this the case? An appropriation bill, practically one of the great appropriation bills, is originated in the House always, or a revenue bill is originated in the House of Representatives. It goes to the Committee of the Whole. Every member has his full opportunity to debate, with very little restraint; every member without restraint has his full opportunity to offer such amendments as he chooses, and to bring about a vote upon them. Then that bill comes to the Senate, and it has no more or less weight, importance, or dignity when it comes up here, proposed by the House of Representatives, than any proposition made in the Senate by any one of the seventy-six members of this body. The Senate entirely remodels it at its pleasure. All agree with the Senator from Maine that our rule excluding general legislation is practically a dead letter against the will of a majority of this body in earnest and determined to accomplish a legislative result. But, however that may be, the bill is modified and remolded in the Senate. There is full debate in this body in Committee of the Whole; there is full opportunity to amend; there is full debate in the Senate, and full opportunity to amend. Then the bill goes back to the House, at the close of the session usually, and what happens? Sometimes there are from twelve to fifteen hundred amendments on one of these great appropriation bills.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House rises in his place and moves to non-concur in those amendments in a lump, and that is always done, and then the matter goes to a committee of conference, consisting of the two leading members of the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee of Ways and Means, as the case may be, and one member of the minority in the House, and that committee of conference meeting the committee of conference of the Senate, makes up a bill, based on the amendments which have been proposed in the Senate and the amendments which have been non-concurred in by the House, and the original bill so far as it has met the assent of the Senate; and then that report being made to the House the one parliamentary question in that body is, Will the House agree to the report? although it may contain fifteen hundred subjects of legislation.

At what price does the House refuse to agree to that report? It is at the price of an extra session of Congress, if the Senate insists permanently on its opinion, and what is that? Every other year it is at the price of having the bill go out of the consideration of the particular House of Representatives then dealing with it to a new one, because the constitutional life of that body is over. Every alternate year it is not at that price but it is at the price of an extra session of Congress held here in the heat of the summer. Practically, as we all know on these great appropriation bills, which not only involve the whole expenditure for carrying on the Government but large numbers of enactments of general legislation, and on the revenue bills when we have them from the Committee of Ways and Means, the House votes on the conference reports without even having in print what they are, without having had an opportunity to utter a word except the particular member of the Appropriation Committee who makes the report, and without any one of its members having an opportunity to propose any amendment.

Suppose, instead of that course being pursued, the reverse were the case, and that the appropriation bill or the revenue bill originated here, what would happen? The Senate's proposition for legislation would then go down to the House, and stand before the House simply with the weight of a proposition made by a single member of that body; and that bill would be remolded at pleasure, with the opportunity of every member of the House to speak upon it, to move amendments to it, to have a vote upon it at his discretion, and it would go into a committee of conference with the full knowledge of the conferees on the part of the House of the opinion of the body they represented disclosed in debate and disclosed by vote on every single proposition that the bill contains. Then the result of the labors of the conference committee would be presented to both branches alike, at the close of the session, and their concurrence in a lump to the views of the conference committee would be exacted at the price of an extra session.

Mr. President, under the present claim of its privileges by the House of Representatives in regard to the bills to which that claim applies, legislation in this country is not by the House of Representatives and the Senate, with the approbation of the President; it is by the Senate, the conference committee of the House of Representatives, and the President. Of course there are great matters which stir the public heart and in regard to which men have earnest and impassioned political beliefs, where the opinion and the purposes of this great body ride over and overcome the fetter which is placed upon itself by its own claim as to its constitutional privilege and its own rules; but I speak of the ordinary usual matters of legislation. So I say, looking simply at a grasp of political power, if we could be disposed to disregard our desire for the due constitutional equality between these two bodies, without regard to the question of which one we belong to, it is not in the interest of the Senate to differ from the doctrine laid down by Mr. Webster. The question of the extent of this constitutional prerogative must be left to the House, and it is not in the interest of the House of Representatives to extend, by construction or by claim, this prerogative beyond the point where the Constitution has left it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not rise to make a speech, but simply to show, as I think I can, that the amendment proposed by me is in order; and I invite the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to what I say. He thinks the Senate decided correctly on the celebrated proposition to increase the salaries that it could not instruct its managers on a committee of conference. I think that the Senate decided wrong on that occasion, and I think it has been since demonstrated completely that it decided wrong, and decided against all the precedents that have been set in the Senate on that subject, so far as they have been found. For the purpose of showing that I am right in this view, I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that a portion of a speech delivered by the Senator from Vermont nearest me [Mr. EDMUNDS] on the 6th of January, 1874, may be read. The Senator from Vermont, after referring to the decision of the 3d of March, 1873, on the salary bill, and saying that in his opinion that decision was wrong, then proceeded to make the remarks which I ask may be read, and to read the paper containing a statement of the previous decision of the Senate, which I ask may also be read as they are part of his remarks. I especially ask the attention of the Senator from Maine to the decision of his colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] who occupied the chair at the time when one of these decisions to which reference is there had was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

I think, Mr. President, that we acted under a grave misapprehension; and I have had a very competent person, whose knowledge of the history of parliamentary law and the course of parliamentary precedents is almost perfect, look back only for a few years to see what our practice has been on that subject. You remember, Mr. President, that the Senate determined, upon an appeal by the then Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Trumbull,] who has now withdrawn to the quiet of private life and who is no more vexed with questions of this kind, that it was not in our power to instruct our own committee to insist that our salaries should not be increased—that we felt ourselves compelled to follow, and in spite of our wishes and our will that our salaries should not be increased in that way then and there, we found ourselves compelled by what we then thought to be parliamentary law to vote that they should be increased. That, it turns out from an investigation, was an error; and I ask that the Clerk may read the congressional history which I send to the desk on that point.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"An examination, extending back but a few years, shows two instances in direct opposition to the ruling of the Senate on the 3d of March last.

"At the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress, the committee of conference upon a bill 'to increase the internal revenue and for other purposes' having reported on the 1st of March, 1864, to the House of Representatives their inability to agree, a resolution was offered by Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, as follows:

"'Resolved, That the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments to House bill No. 122, and that the House request of the Senate another committee of conference on the said bill; and it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House that in an adjustment of the differences between the two Houses on the said bill, there should be an additional duty of not less than twenty nor more than forty cents per gallon imposed on spirits on hand for sale.' (Cong. Globe, p. 892, pt. 1, 1st sess. 38th Cong.)

"A question of order being raised, the decision of the Speaker [Mr. Colfax] was as follows:

"'The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the House of Representatives has the power to instruct any committee which it authorizes to be appointed. It is a judicious check upon the power of the Speaker in appointing committees. They have a right to instruct a committee of conference as they have a right to instruct a standing or a select committee. The gentleman from Illinois moves this himself as a resolution. It seems, however, susceptible of division, first, upon asking another committee of conference, and, secondly, upon the instructions. As to the right to move instructions the Chair has no doubt.' (Cong. Globe, pt. 1, 1st sess. 38th Cong., p. 892.)

"The decision of the Speaker was acquiesced in by the House, no appeal being taken, and the resolution of Mr. Washburne was agreed to.

"On the following day, the action of the House of Representatives having been communicated to the Senate, the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, offered the following resolution:

"'Resolved, That the conference requested by the House of Representatives be agreed to; and that the conferees heretofore appointed by the Senate be instructed to agree to proper amendments to the Senate amendments disagreed to by the House, providing for a tax of not exceeding twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand for sale.' (Ibid., p. 900.)

"The late Senator from Maine, Mr. Fessenden, at once suggested a doubt as to the resolution being in order; to which the Senator from Ohio replied, as follows:

"'I have not examined for precedents, but I think there can be no doubt of the power of the Senate to instruct its conferees on any point. It is a question of discretion. Ordinarily it would not be done; but there have been two conferences on this disagreement, which has all grown out of one difference. The House of Representatives have now expressed their opinion on that difference, and I think the Senate ought also to do so.' (Ibid., p. 900.)

"Mr. Fessenden then raised the question of order directly for the decision of the Chair, and the Vice-President, who is now Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] gave his decision in the following words:

"'The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair can have no doubt that the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio is in order. Conferences are of two characters—free, and simple. A free conference is that which leaves the committee of conference entirely free to pass upon any subject where the two branches have disagreed in their votes, not, however, including any action upon any subject where there has been a concurrent vote of both branches. A simple conference—perhaps it should more properly be termed a strict or a specific conference, though the parliamentary term is "simple"—is that which confines the committee of conference to the specific instructions of the body appointing it. The Chair therefore rules that the resolution is in order.'

"In the discussion which ensued, the Senator from Ohio said:

"'The Senate might very properly object to any action by the Senate conferees which was not strictly within the parliamentary rule, but the Senate itself may, by its instructions, enlarge the power of the committee. There is no doubt about that. There is no limit to the power of the Senate over its committees. It may authorize its conferees to agree to amendments to its amendments, which might not be in order if those amendments to the amendments came directly from the conferees without the action of the Senate. That is the view all the conferees took, although they differed on the question of parliamentary law.' (Ibid., p. 900.)

"In the course of the debate, Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, said:

"'I agree with the decision of the President of the Senate that it is competent to instruct a committee of conference on the part of the Senate.' (Ibid., p. 902.)

"Again he said:

"'In respect to the question of disagreement, the Senate may instruct its part of the committee, but outside of the questions of disagreement the Senate cannot instruct that committee, for the reason that that is not one of the modes of legislation known to parliamentary usages. * * * The Senate may instruct the committee upon all the questions that were referred to that committee, but not upon other questions.' (Ibid., p. 902 and 903.)

"From this view of parliamentary law no Senator dissented, although the debate on the subject-matter extends over many pages of the Congressional Globe.

"The result of the debate, which was quite protracted, was the rejection of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, although no one doubted the right of the Senate to instruct the conferees, and the adoption of the following resolution offered by Mr. Conness, of California:

"'Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 1st instant, proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.' (Ibid., p. 907.)

"The House of Representatives having agreed to a further free conference, the conferees on again meeting were unable to agree, and the bill was disposed of by the Senate receding from its amendments.

"The proceedings in this case, as in that which follows, are recorded in the Journal, but the Congressional Globe is quoted from, because it contains the details of the points raised, with the decisions made and the debate thereon, instead of the Journal, which merely records the votes.

"At the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress an amendment was added by the Senate to the sundry civil expenses appropriation bill increasing the pay of Senators and Representatives and taking effect retroactively from the beginning of that Congress. This amendment was disagreed to by the House of Representatives, but they amended other Senate amendments by the addition of a provision granting bounties to the soldiers of the war of the rebellion. Two committees of conference were unable to agree upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and when the second disagreement was recorded the Globe shows these proceedings occurred:

"'Several SENATORS. What shall be done?

"'Mr. SHERMAN. There is but one point of difficulty. The Senate conferees proposed to recede from the amendment in regard to the pay of members, but found that that was not at all in the way; that could be laid out of view: the only difficulty is in regard to the question of bounties. The House insist upon some legislation being had in regard to the bounties, and their conferees submitted a proposition which we did not feel at liberty to accept. I will say that the proposition submitted is much more moderate and much more reasonable than any I have yet seen: but we considered that the action of the Senate did not leave us at liberty to accept it.' (Cong. Globe, Thirty-ninth Cong., 1st sess., pt. 3, p. 4246.)

"And subsequently the Senator from Ohio suggested:

"'The Senate may instruct the conferees.' (Ibid., p. 4247.)

"Whereupon Mr. Trumbull, then a Senator from Illinois, moved—

"'That the committee of conference be instructed to agree to that proposition of the House.' (Ibid., p. 4247.)

"Meaning the proposition which had been stated in detail by Mr. Sherman as having been made by the House conferees.

"A modification of the terms of the proposition having been suggested by Mr. Doolittle, Mr. Trumbull said:

"'The proper motion, I suppose, would be to recommit the report to the committee, with instructions to agree to that proposition.' (Ibid., p. 4247.)

"No point of order was raised, no doubt was suggested by any Senator as to the power of the body to instruct the conferees; and the motion having been stated, amendments to the instructions were moved, and finally, the question recurring on the motion of Mr. Trumbull, it was agreed to by a vote of yeas 28, nays 5. (Ibid., page 4248.) And on the very same page of the Globe it appears that the conferees immediately made a report conformably to the instructions of the Senate, and it was agreed to and the bill disposed of."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I have had this short congressional history, going back only a few years, read in order to show, as I think it ought to show, that both Houses had habitually instructed their conferees to insist upon or to agree to particular things. In this body it was done in form in that way. (Congressional Record, Forty-third Congress, first session, vol. 2, pt. 1, pp. 402, 403.)

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I submit to the honorable Senator from Ohio that what he has produced here proves, and proves very conclusively, that I was right. The case which he cites from the House I think was pending a tax bill upon whisky; and if the Senator from Ohio will give me his attention he will observe that the resolution passed by the House was not a resolution of instruction at all. A point of order was made upon it that it was, but there being some doubt about what the conference would do, and there being a little doubt about how they might think the judgment of the House was, the House, when the conference committee was appointed, passed a declaratory resolution; and it coming up here under the decision of the Speaker that they were an instructed conference, what did the Senate do? The Senate refused to join.

Will the honorable Senator please remember then that when an instructed conference was proposed from the House the Senate refused to join, and there was no conference until the House had receded from that position and a free conference was had? It seems to me that the matter runs down very rapidly to the reductio ad absurdum. Here is a single point of difference perhaps between the two Houses, as often happens. There is a disagreement. The Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio maintain that you can have a conference absolutely instructed not to yield or change a hair. Then, what is the need of the conference?

It is exactly in the position of an old client who went to his lawyer and said he was very much in need of advice, and said he, "the kind of advice I want you to give me is that which a man likes who has made his mind up." That is precisely what is proposed here, that an absolutely free conference can be had under explicit and absolute instructions from the other side.

The only other case that the Senator from Vermont cites in this long line of illustrious precedents that broke down at two, neither of which was a case in point, was when a conference committee was instructed to surrender to the House and not longer to stand out. There had been several conferences, and the conferees themselves had been somewhat stubborn in really representing the wishes of the Senate, and finally they simply went and surrendered the point to the House under a vote of the Senate intimating that such a course would be approved.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator read the remarks of his colleague?

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague, then Vice-President, from whom I should certainly be sorry to differ, stated very distinctly that there were two kinds of conferences, "simple and free." My honorable colleague was using a phrase no longer familiar to the two Houses, but he drew a distinction on which his decision might very properly be based. The binding phraseology, however, employed between the Senate and House, which has become ingrained in the whole parliamentary law of the two bodies, is "a full and free conference." I undertake to say that the Senator from Vermont has not shown and he cannot show where any proposition for a restricted and instructed conference on the part of one branch while it was to be "full and free" on the part of the other. Certainly the two precedents do not show it at all, but they show just the reverse.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am not sure that I have learned yet the motive exactly of the Senator from Ohio in having read again the very long paper prepared, I believe, by the then Chief Clerk, to which four or five years ago we all listened in the Senate. I remember very well the occasion which gave rise to that paper. It was the addition of a provision for back pay, as it was called, to an appropriation bill, and the attempt made here to instruct a conference committee what it should do. I was among the Senators who opposed that instruction. I did it, not misunderstanding the odium which might rest upon those who assumed that position, because of the liability of being represented to favor the increase of salary, which happened to be the particular subject involved at the moment. As the question is reproduced now, I am unwilling to lose the opportunity of recording myself again in opposition to the idea, by whomever advanced, that whether a salary bill or any other bill, however hateful, is the topic of consideration, it is anything but a monstrous violation of parliamentary law and as I think of common sense, to undertake to instruct a committee of conference.

I do not remember what distinction between conference committees may have been drawn in the past by the honorable Senator from Maine by my side [Mr. HAMLIN] at the time presiding officer of this body, nor have I freshly in recollection the distinction to which he must have referred; but in general terms I venture to assert that very old and very new and very constant in the parliamentary law is a difference found between a special conference, (possibly that is not the favorite term of late years but I will call it a special conference,) deputed by one House to carry to another a special message, and that customary conference which has always been known as a full and free conference. That distinction I say exists, although I may not give to the respective committees the technical appellation which heretofore they have earned. But I venture to repeat, as I wish never to be silent in doing when it behooves me to speak, that I believe nothing to be more utterly repugnant and impossible to the idea of a full and free conference committee than that either House after appointing one should send along instructions, "Now, you are to agree to this, and you are to maintain this, and you are instructed accordingly, and you are forbidden to agree to anything else." I say, with great respect to all Senators who may differ with me, that such a proposition to my mind is simply nonsensical. The idea of appointing an agent to act in the domain of discretion and then telling him he has no discretion at all except to say hit or miss on a given point, is very much like an election which was once held in the Empire of France where the ballots were to this effect: "Louis Napoleon. Yes or no." That was an election, but it was not that full and free election which especially in the State of Connecticut is supposed to prevail.

Mr. EATON. I wish you had in New York also full and fair elections. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I hope that such ignorance does not prevail in many parts of New England as must exist in Connecticut if they suppose there that we have anything in New York but a full and fair election. [Laughter.] I hope a delusion like that is confined to the State of Connecticut, and I am shocked to find that it prevails there.

Mr. EATON. I make no question but that the elections in New York are full enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, we have on some recent occasions found them very full, and that where there was not only a full but a free conference of all the citizens of that State, without respect of race or color; and if the honorable Senator from Connecticut is satisfied, as I judge he is, with those, I beg to agree with him enthusiastically in the satisfaction he finds.

May I have read the pending amendment, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] as modified by him, will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the second report of the committee of conference, made by Mr. KIRKWOOD, June 18, 1878, and the committee be discharged.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there no amendment pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] suggested an amendment, but the Chair did not understand him to formally present it.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there no amendment to that original resolution pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the resolution:

And that the conferees to be appointed on the part of the Senate be instructed to recede from the amendment of the Senate relating to the franking privilege, added by way of proviso to the eleventh section.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg leave to modify the phraseology of the amendment so as to read that the conferees "be instructed to agree to strike out" instead of "to recede from" the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not see why the Senator from Ohio should be so tender about the word "recede." If we are going to pass a resolution in violation, as I think, and as a majority of the Senate has heretofore declared, of all parliamentary law, why not delegate to this committee of conference the power to recede? It belongs not to them but to the Senate; but I do not think it would make it much worse to delegate to them that option. However, the Senator has control of his own amendment. It is, then, to instruct the committee to strike out? Is that the only amendment pending, if I may ask?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has suggested an amendment. The Chair does not understand it to be pending.

Mr. BLAINE. I had not liberty to offer it at the time I read it, but I shall present it at the proper time.

Mr. CONKLING. May I hear that read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Maine.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the amendments of the Senate to the pending bill, changing the rate of duties on imported books and affecting the revenues of the Government by declaring certain mail matter free which now pays postage, being in the judgment of the House an infringement of the constitutional rights of that body, they are hereby withdrawn from the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, one, perhaps two of these amendments enables me to make a remark which I would gladly commend to the attention of the Senate. The latter amendment read recites, if I caught it aright, that the judgment of the House being in one direction, therefore the Senate proceeds to take action. I submit that that is rather a dangerous criterion for the Senate to adopt, particularly in a case like this; for the Senate would say, not because the Senate holds a certain ground but because the House holds that ground, therefore it will or will not proceed to insist upon its views of legislation. Waiving that, however, if the conference committee is to be instructed to strike out, or the Senate is to declare that it recedes from an amendment adopted, some ground, I take it, should be assigned for that action. What is the ground assigned here? That the Senate has originated by an amendment something, if I am correctly informed, in the nature of a money bill. Has it occurred to any member of the Senate to inquire whether in any sense these amendments are in the nature of a money bill? It is alleged that because the Senate, dealing with a post-route bill, has added provisions which affect the rate of postage, therefore it has been originating money provisions. Is that true? A money bill is a revenue bill. Is the regulation of the rate of postage a bill dealing with the revenue? It may be said, doubtless it will be said, that postage goes into the Treasury, particularly surplus postage; postage beyond the expense of carrying on the Post-Office Department becomes revenue. Yes, sir, it does; and in that point of view it would affect the revenue. But let us see whether the Senate is prepared to accept that as the test of a revenue bill. Only yesterday, without division, the Senate adopted a bill rearranging and amending the patent laws. It originated here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the Judiciary Committee reported a bill arranging the fees of marshals, clerks, and other judicial officers, which passed.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes. That bill amending the patent laws originated here. It was a Senate bill. It was long discussed, discussed industriously to waste time, I think, if the suggestion now made be tenable. Why? Among other things, the bill changes entirely the sums, the items, the rates, and the totals to be paid at the Patent Office; and I heard the chairman of the Committee on Patents state what the revenue had been during a series of years from the emission of patents. The sums had paid all the expenses of the Patent Office, and had yielded a large revenue besides. Very well; taking up the very gist of the whole matter, the fees to be paid by applicants for patents and the avails of transacting the business of the Patent Office, the Senate proceeded radically to change the law in those respects. Was that legislation a money bill in English phrase? Was it a revenue bill or a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of our Constitution? If it was, we violated the privileges of the House; if it was, we wasted some weeks, I take it, now and again, in debate over the measure; and yet so we did if the point aimed at this bill is well taken, unless there be some distinction which I do not understand.

Under the provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads, the two Houses were engaged, in legislating, engaged upon a bill apt and fit in that regard, and so legislating the Senate adopted a provision, the Senator from Maine usually nearest me [Mr. HAMLIN] insisting it to be the simple requirement of a treaty; but, however that may be, a provision merely touching the rate at which postage matter might pass through the mails. If I understand it, the House says, "Because, if there is a deficiency in the Post-Office Department money must be appropriated to make up that deficiency; because, if there is a surplus from the postal service, that surplus goes into the Treasury, ergo, legislating on the subject affects the revenue and thus the legislation becomes a bill for raising revenue within the construed meaning of the parliamentary law and the practice of the two Houses." I am not ready for one to assent to any such doctrine.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] reminds me of the practice of the Senate in fixing the salaries and fees of marshals, of clerks of courts, of district attorneys, and of other officers belonging to the judicial staff of the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And requiring the money to be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. CONKLING. And making the usual adjunct provision that all received above a maximum is to be paid into the Treasury and all below that is to be devoted otherwise. Well, again, if there is a deficiency, appropriations must be made to fill up the deficiency and carry on the judicial business of the country. If there is a surplus, again that surplus is carried into the Treasury and becomes a part of the national fund, goes into the national account. So that, for aught I see, in that case as much as in this, the Senate has been violating the privileges of the House by originating a money bill or dealing with a bill to raise revenue.

Mr. President, I deny it. I deny it upon principle and upon reason, and I deny it upon the immemorial practice of the Senate, and I might add the necessity of convenient legislation; and therefore, apart from what I conceive to be the wholly inadmissible doctrine that you may appoint a committee of conference to confer with the House, and compare differences, and in the same breath forbid them to do any such thing by instructions, I am not at all prepared to say in any form that because the House of Representatives inadvertently or intentionally, as the case may be, deals with a post-route bill, which we have amended, as if it was a revenue bill, and sends us such a resolution, we are to turn around and say, "very well, because the House takes this position, or for some other reason, we admit it; we admit at least in this instance that we have no right to say anything about the rate of postage, because consequentially and indirectly it may affect the revenue, and therefore we give up" what I need not at this moment call one of the privileges of the Senate, but "we give up one of the most customary and one of the most necessary functions of the Senate in dealing with all matters of this sort."

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that his amendment would better apply to the second motion that I propose to make, and that is that a new committee of conference be appointed on the merits of the amendments to the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Is not that motion pending?

Mr. FERRY. I divided it, supposing the Senator wanted to reach the judgment of the Senate on the question whether it would agree to those amendments which he has pointed out as objectionable. I therefore, to disembarrass the Senate, divided my proposition and asked simply for an agreement to the report and a discharge of the committee for this reason. This committee of conference was appointed to meet a committee of conference on the part of the House upon a resolution. In that conference on that resolution the judgment of the conferees on the part of the House was that its scope was not large enough to cover the consideration of the merits of the bill and amendments. Therefore there would be no object reached; in fact it would be a defeat of the object to instruct this committee, if the Senate deems it fit to instruct the committee of conference. The only way in my judgment by which it can be reached is to agree to the report and then insist upon the amendments, and if the Senator from Ohio then excepts certain amendments he can move to recede from them and insist on the remainder, and thus the new committee will be charged with the judgment of the Senate upon the merits of the case.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, of all the questions that ever arise in the Senate, questions of order are those that I dislike most to tackle. We have had an illustration of the danger of tackling such questions to-day. Here is the senior Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] whose experience in both branches of Congress extends over a greater period of time, I believe, than that of any man now in the public service, and who was once presiding officer of this body, who ruled after debate that it is in order to instruct a conference committee. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is known to be one of the best informed Senators on the subject of parliamentary law there is in this body, affirms that such an instruction is perfectly competent. On the other hand the junior Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who has presided with so much distinction in the other branch of the legislature, says that it is not in order, and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] says it is nonsensical.

Mr. CONKLING. I think so, though I may not have said so.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir, undoubtedly the Senator does think so. However, I should think that a proposition which had been sustained as this proposition has been sustained, which has such great names in support of it, and which has had the usage of the Senate, or did have the usage of the Senate up to the celebrated salary-grab decision in its favor, ought not to be charged to be a nonsensical proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator will allow me, he probably does not mean to do injustice to me. I deny as matter of fact what he assumes. I deny that it ever was the practice or the judgment of the Senate. I deny the application of the precedents cited. And I affirm, after a careful examination made some years ago, that the judgment of the Senate always, with the reasons given for that judgment, authorizes me in saying that it is utterly repugnant to the idea of a conference committee.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, denial does not amount to much unless some one produces some evidence in support of his denial. I think that any one who will read what I had read by the Secretary will find that the Senate has again and again instructed a conference committee; and if there has been any case in which the Senate ever refused to do it, or ever decided that it had no power to do it, until its decision upon the celebrated back-salary bill, I never saw it.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. THURMAN. No, I believe not. I do not want to talk on this matter long, and therefore prefer to get through.

Mr. President, I said I disliked to talk upon these questions of order and parliamentary law. I never gave any attention to them, and God helping me I never will; I prefer to think about something else. But I have one thing that governs me—I believe in the rules of common sense, and I do not think much of any parliamentary law that violates the rules of plain common sense; and if anybody thinks he is bound by parliamentary law when it is found to be in violation of the rules of plain common sense, I think he is mistaken in his law.

Mr. President, what is the common sense of the position in which we are now placed? The Senate passed a bill, the post-route bill, with amendments. In those amendments were contained two provisions, one in reference to a subsidy for a steamship line, the other setting up the franking privilege again. The House returned the bill to us saying the Senate had infringed the privileges of the House in the passage of that bill with those amendments by inserting provisions in it that could only originate in the House. I do not give the exact language of the message of the House, but that is the substance of it. The House did not specify what were the particulars wherein we had violated the privileges of the House or arrogated a right to ourselves that we did not possess.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the exact language if the Senator would like to hear it.

Mr. THURMAN. No, I do not care about it now, because I want to get through. I have stated the substance of it. The House returned the bill, asserting that the Senate had arrogated to itself a right that did not belong to it in certain provisions of its amendments. A committee of conference followed. The House would not agree to consider the provisions that were objected to upon their merits, because the managers at the conference on behalf of the House considered themselves bound by the opinion of the House that those provisions ought not to be in the bill at all and could not be put in it by the Senate. Another committee of conference followed, I believe, and with precisely the same result, or substantially so. Now the question comes, What are we to do—as men of common sense what are we to do?

We are told by the Senator from Vermont, and on reflection I am inclined to think he is right, that we cannot recede from these provisions in the bill until the House disagrees to them, and the House does not disagree to them; it refuses to consider them at all. Therefore we cannot come to any agreement by receding from them in the ordinary way. What, then, can we do except to lose the bill or to take the course that I suggest? The Senator from Michigan suggests a course which it does not seem to me is at all admissible if the Senator from Vermont is right, for he proposes that we shall in the end recede from these provisions in the bill.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator misapprehends me. My proposition was that the report be agreed to, and that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for another conference. I stated, however, as the Senator from Ohio desired to reach certain amendments and to reject them, I would divide my motion and simply ask first for an agreement to the report, and then follow it by a motion to insist on the amendments and ask for a new committee of conference, when the proposition of the Senator from Ohio to instruct the committee would be, in my judgment, in place.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well, so that it is in place, I do not care whether it is divided or not.

Mr. FERRY. But I desire to say in this connection to the Senator from Ohio that it would be useless to instruct the present committee, as the House conferees have decided that under its resolution they cannot travel beyond the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I have not proposed to instruct the present committee. My amendment is to instruct the managers to be appointed. That is my proposition, and that is the point I am upon.

We could recede from our amendments provided the House had disagreed to them; but the Senator from Vermont says, and I am inclined to think truly, that we cannot recede from them until the House does disagree. But the House will not consider them at all. Now, what is more plain common sense than to instruct our conferees to agree to strike out these provisions from the bill? The House says that they must be stricken out because we have no right to put them in. The House has told us so. What is more plain common sense and a more plain, practical way of getting out of this dead-lock than for us to tell our conferees "we agree that you may strike those provisions out of the bill?"

Mr. FERRY. How does the Senator from Ohio know that those two features of the amendments are the only ones to which the House disagree?

Mr. THURMAN. I shall assume that they are. I have named one of them; some other Senator who thinks there is another can name another; and if there is a third one, some Senator who thinks that is involved may move to include that. I content myself with naming one.

Mr. FERRY. Let me state to the Senator from Ohio that the conferees on the part of the Senate suggested the rejection of one or more of the features to which the Senator has alluded; and yet with that proposition on the part of the conferees of the Senate, the House through their conferees declined to act.

Mr. THURMAN. But if we pass a resolution now for a committee of conference and with instructions to these conferees to agree to strike out these provisions of the bill which the House says cannot originate in the Senate, who can doubt for a moment that the committee of conference would come to an agreement? I say that is the common sense of the thing; and if common sense is nonsense then the Senator from New York is right; if common sense is not nonsense, then I am right.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I found this paper in very fine type, and a little too fine for my eyes. I have got the aid of a neighbor's glasses, and I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio to listen while I read this great precedent which the Senate set in instructing a committee of conference.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the Senator would address himself to the Senator from Vermont; that is his speech.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Ohio introduced it. I address myself to both those Senators and to all fair-minded men, and I want to show this great precedent of instructing a committee of conference on the part of the Senate! The House passed this resolution on the 1st of March, 1864. There are several gentlemen on this floor who in common with myself were present and took part in those proceedings:

Resolved, That the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments to House bill No. 122, and that the House request of the Senate another conference between the committees of conference on the said bill.

Then they add:

And it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House that in the adjustment of differences between the two Houses on the said bill there should be an additional duty of not less than twenty nor more than forty cents per gallon imposed on spirits on hand for sale.

That was not a direct instruction to the committee, as will be readily observed; it was merely a declaration of what was the sense of the House. It came to the Senate. It was elaborately debated. Mr. Sherman, the present Secretary of the Treasury, moved to join in the conference with instructions to the Senate conferees, and after a protracted debate the Senate, on a vote by yeas and nays, by 15 yeas to 25 nays, refused to join it, and immediately afterward, according to this very record, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st instant, proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

That is what the Senator from Vermont calls a precedent showing that conference committees have been instructed by Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if it is not true that in the English Parliament practically conferees are instructed where the conferees are appointed merely to communicate to one house the proceedings of the other house or to insist on certain usages?

Mr. BLAINE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HOAR. So much so that it is laid down as a rule in English parliamentary treatises that it is not proper to ask for a free conference at all until two instructed conferences have been held.

Mr. BLAINE. The same thing is embodied in Jefferson's Manual; and the decision which my honorable colleague, who was then Vice-President, made, was that, drawing the proper distinction between a simple and a free conference, the motion was in order. That was all. The decision of the Vice-President was right, entirely right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all I contended for.

Mr. BLAINE. That it might be in order if you made a distinction between a simple and a free conference. It has not been the habit, however, to use these phrases in our parliamentary law and practice of late years, and this very precedent itself ended by the Senate itself rejecting, by a vote of 25 to 15, a proposition for an instructed conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, we have at last got, through the aid of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, the Senator from Maine down to the point, and that is that a motion to instruct a committee of conference proposed to be appointed by this body is in order.

Mr. BLAINE. No, I do not say so. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that is what the Senator said in substance. I may be mistaken. If the Senator says I am, then I take it that I am. Then I do not understand and I am sure I must have misunderstood what the Senator from Massachusetts said and what the Senator from Maine replied to.

Mr. BLAINE. I agreed with him that there was a practice in the English Parliament to that effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And so he said that his colleague, then the Vice-President of the United States sitting in that chair, decided rightly. Now if you turn to the record you will find that the honorable Senator then the Vice-President decided in terms, the point being made, that a motion to instruct a conference committee was in order in totidem verbis. Now what is the sense of this thing as well as its history? First its history. I undertake to say with considerable assurance that until we came to the back-salary question, called the grab, there never was an instance in all the parliamentary history of the English Parliament or of the Congress of the United States in which when a motion was made to instruct a conference committee a point of order was raised against it or being raised was sustained, and the short examination of the records made by our talented and capable Reporter (not by the late Chief Clerk of the Senate) which was embodied in what I stated on the succeeding day showed it.

My honorable friend says that the one precedent referred to in this Chamber—he calls it one, there are two—showed that that was not the case. Why? Because the Senate declared its judgment as to what its agents ought to do instead of putting it in the technical form of a command. That is a distinction without a difference. You might just as well say that a foreign ambassador, one of our ministers sent to a foreign country could not have a free conference with the minister of the nation to which he was accredited, because he was conferring under instructions. To borrow a phrase from my honorable friend from New York but changing it a little,—I think he said it was absurd to consider it; I should say to maintain such a proposition was nonsense. The mistake into which Senators fall, with great respect, as it seems to me, is simply this: they think that an agent cannot confer freely and urge the views of his principal if he is under any instructions at all as to what he ought to insist upon. I do not understand the term "free conference" or free anything in any such sense; perhaps I may be wrong.

But there was another Senate precedent, when the honorable Senator from Illinois, (Mr. Trumbull,) who made the point of order on the salary bill and carried it, only a few sessions before had himself moved in distinct terms to instruct a committee of conference of this body, and it was done.

So, Mr. President, as far as there is any precedent in respect of this matter, the only one adverse to the right of the Senate to pass any vote as to what any of its committees shall do is found on the salary bill—nowhere else that anybody can find or refer to. But, as I say, what is the sense of it? The two committees of conference are merely the agents, the representatives of their principals behind them. They are appointed to represent and insist upon the views of those principals and convince the other side if they can, and instruction to them is only a guide which they are in honor and duty bound to follow, a guide to the points they should insist upon, leaving them the fullest scope for bringing forward the reasons of what they shall do. That is what the theory of it is; and therefore even a free conference in the technical sense, which I think is not proposed here as such in name, is not a conference where either House or its agents have a right to back out of the whole bill, but it is only a conference which in respect to the urgency of the occasion is not foreclosed as to the views that either side is to present and the reasons for trying to persuade the other that it ought to yield. But that is a criticism that it is entirely unnecessary to go into here. This resolution is to have a conference. The proposition of the Senator from Ohio is to instruct the agents of this body to say to the agents of the other side "we are willing to withdraw from our insistence upon certain propositions." That is all there is to it.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me to put him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. If a committee of conference is appointed on the part of the Senate, and they be instructed in the two particulars or on the two propositions suggested by the Senator from Ohio, is it not an implication that the conferees are prohibited from yielding upon any other point of disagreement between the two Houses? In other words, if they find that they can agree by surrendering the two propositions pointed out by the Senator from Ohio, and a third one besides, will they not fail to agree because the Senate have instructed them in the two particulars to yield and in all the rest to insist?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a question of interpretation and not of order. That addresses itself to the question of whether it is right to instruct them, whether it is wise. That is quite a different question, which I am not now discussing at all; but I should say no to my honorable friend. I should think they would be just as free to recommend to the Senate that it recede from something else or agree to something else with modifications as they were before. I should have no doubt upon that point.

Now I will leave this question of order and come to the precise question that is now before us, and that is the first division of the motion of the Senator from Michigan, and that is to agree to the report made on the 18th of June, 1878. Now let us see what there is to agree to, whether it is at all necessary or proper, I do not mean in the sense of order——

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me I desire to restore the other portion of my proposition, and put it as I originally presented it, inasmuch as the Senator from Ohio desires to instruct the committee and take the sense of the Senate. I therefore offer it as originally presented by myself.

Mr. WHYTE. Then let it be reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported over again, so that I shall know what it is I am talking about.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the second report of the committee of conference on the resolution of the House returning the bill of the House with the amendments of the Senate, made by Mr. KIRKWOOD June 18, 1878, further insist upon its amendments to the bill, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] proposes an amendment, to add what will be read.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

And that the conferees to be appointed on the part of the Senate be instructed to agree to strike out from the amendments of the Senate the amendment of the Senate relating to the franking privilege added by way of proviso to the eleventh section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty about the resolution of the Senator from Michigan, it appears to me, is, first, as to the part of it which agrees to the report of the committee of conference, (which is perhaps of no practical consequence except as a precedent in the future,) that there is no report which calls for any action of the Senate. They simply recite what they have done; that they have met the other party and have come to no conclusion about it because they could not agree. Now it does not require any vote of the Senate, and it is quite unnecessary and would be a bad precedent, in my opinion, although it is not of great consequence,—in this instance none at all,—to adopt that proposition.

Then we come to the second part, which is of consequence, and that is a statement to the House of Representatives that we insist upon our amendments, upon the disagreeing votes. Well, there has not been any disagreeing vote, as I understand the history of this thing and as all others understand it, on these amendments. The House of Representatives have simply returned to us as irregular a bill of their own that we sent back to them with a particular amendment, because they said we had invaded their constitutional rights by proposing such an amendment to that bill, and they would neither receive the bill nor the amendment, although they are on separate pieces of paper. So, as it appears to me, the resolution of the Senator from Michigan does not state the case as it is; and that is one difficulty with me in voting for it. There is no disagreement in respect of these amendments between the two Houses on the amendments themselves. The point of difference between the two Houses is an entirely separate matter, and that is that we have proposed to them a kind of legislation which they decline to receive and consider at all. They neither agree to it nor disagree to it. They decline to act upon it because they say we have no business to send them such a paper. And therefore if we wish to interchange views with the House of Representatives on the point that they make, our resolution should be addressed to that point, and should ask the House of Representatives to confer further upon the subject of their resolution that returned these amendments as irregular, or else we must adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Maine and send them a resolution on that very point, that they making this point and we yielding to it, because it amounts to that, these things are to be taken as being irregular, and then leaving the bill to proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish to repair a wrong which I have done to myself as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] seems to understand. In some observations I made a few moments ago, I said of something of which I was speaking that it seemed to me nonsensical. The honorable Senator from Ohio evidently understood that I applied that word to his amendment. I wish now to say to him in all frankness that having been called for a moment out of the door when his amendment was read, I not only did not know the nature of his amendment, but I did not know that he had offered an amendment at all. Therefore I could not have intended to characterize his amendment as nonsensical.

I had listened, not for the first time because several times before this memorandum has been read which it turns out is the work of our accomplished Reporter—I agree that he is very accomplished—I speak of it now, however, with the more freedom because it seems to be the work of one living and not as I supposed the work of one dead. It has been read in my hearing several times before and read for the purpose of proving a proposition which I did not know the Senator had embodied in his amendment; and speaking of that proposition, it was that I said it seemed to me nonsensical. I cannot withdraw that remark in conscience, because I do sincerely believe that few things more grotesque can be presented to the mind of a man who knows anything about parliamentary law than the notion that you can have not only a conference but a full and free conference and in the same breath say that it shall not be any such thing.

I agree with the Senator from Vermont,—I did on the occasion referred to when we had a debate in the Senate and have always since I knew anything about this question,—that it is entirely regular to have a simple or special conference and instruct it to go and do a specific thing. All I meant to deny was and is that you can have a full and free conference as understood and as existing, and at the same time so instruct it that it ceases to be full and free. It was only so much that I intended to say, and I beg to assure the honorable Senator from Ohio that I had not in the employment of that term the remotest reference to him because he had expressed no opinion on the point, and certainly none in his amendment, for I did not then know that he had offered any amendment, and of course not the amendment which it turns out had come from him.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire simply to make one observation because it seems to me that the affirmations made by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from New York on the one side, and the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio on the other, while they are apparently in conflict, are not really so. They are speaking really of different things. There is no doubt whatever that there are two kinds of conferences known to parliamentary usage both in this country and in England. One is a conference to communicate by one legislative body its action or its reason or its desire to the other, or to persuade the other by conveying to it certain arguments to do something which the co-ordinate body desires. That is a simple conference, and of course for a conference of that class instructions are not only usual but are necessary. On the other hand there is a free conference, in which the agents of the two legislative bodies seek to reconcile upon a common platform differences in regard to what it is expedient to do in legislative or other action of the body. That is a free conference.

Now, the fundamental and practical distinction for our purpose to-day between these two classes of conferences is in the power which the conferees are clothed with in reference to their own body. The instructed conference has no right to recommend legislation or amendment or modification of legislation to the body which it represents. It can simply convey a message and report it, or receive a message and report it. That is the limit of its power. The free conference on the other hand has full jurisdiction over the bill which is committed to it, so far as the differences of opinion between the two branches go, to reconcile those differences by new provisions or modified provisions, or by adopting the purpose or desire of one or the other, as it pleases. Now, the question between an instructed and a free conference comes up as a question of order when they make their report. If this conference goes down to the House instructed, if the only instruction it has is to convey to the House the fact that the Senate has receded from an amendment, that may be done by the committee of conference as well as by the Clerk; and in England it is done by a committee of conference instead of being done by an officer or member of the body; that is all. They cannot then report any new legislation. I presume that it would be in the power of the House or the Senate to combine the two, and that there being three amendments in regard to which the two branches differ, we might instruct our conferees to inform the House that we receded from one where they differed from us, and proposed a free conference in regard to the other two.

It does not seem to me there is any substantial difference of opinion between the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Ohio in regard to this matter.

Mr. BLAINE. I know this discussion is rather a dry one, but I merely want on a question of fact to settle one other point which the Senator from Vermont has brought up. This long paper to which reference has been made only contains two cases. The Senator spoke of numerous precedents, and he had an expert at work to go over the records of the Government and he only found two. The first I have spoken of. Now what was the second? A conference was had on a salary bill in 1866, and there was also a provision in it about bounty. Mr. Sherman, the present Secretary of the Treasury, was chairman of the conference on the part of the Senate. He comes in and states to the Senate that the conferees come very near agreeing with the House, but they could not do it because they did not feel at liberty to give way on a certain point. Mr. Trumbull got up and moved that they be instructed to give way, and the Senator from Vermont calls that instructing a committee of conference, and they went out and yielded to the House.

After all this search these are the only two cases the Senator adduces, and neither of them comes within a thousand leagues of establishing any thing else than the direct reverse of what he has asserted.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry or two. I have listened as attentively as I could to this debate all day, and I desire to ascertain the condition of the question. I understand the Senator from Michigan now to propose to agree to a report, which is simply a report of a disagreement, and then to suggest another conference. Another conference about what? This bill, as amended by the Senate, I understand has never yet been considered by the House of Representatives at all. Now, the Senator from Ohio proposes to instruct the new committee of conference that they shall recede from two amendments. In what condition will that leave us supposing the House agrees to this new conference? The House has not yet disagreed to a single amendment proposed by the Senate. Am I right or wrong about that?

Mr. CONKLING. They have not considered the amendments at all.

Mr. ALLISON. They have not agreed to or disagreed to a single amendment in this bill, and we propose in advance to instruct our conferees, assuming that we can instruct them, that they shall recede from two of these amendments.

Mr. BLAINE. To recede on the part of the Senate—not to instruct the conferees at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, take either view of it. The customary way is to number the amendments made in the Senate to House bills, and the reverse. When these two committees of conference get together what will be the character of their jurisdiction? That is what troubles me. It certainly will not be claimed that the House committee of conference, if appointed, can go into the details of this bill when the House itself has not acted upon those details. Therefore it seems to me that the only possible question we can raise now with the House is the question of privilege which they have suggested, and that we should treat with them with reference to this question of privilege. I have understood from the run of the debate that this bill has not been itself before either of the committees of conference. Whether it has or not, they had no right to have the bill.

Mr. WHYTE. It has not been officially before them.

Mr. ALLISON. The House of Representatives returned the bill to the Senate of the United States, and it must lie upon that table until it is considered. The question that was submitted to these two committees of conference was the question of difference, to wit, the question of privilege raised by the House of Representatives. We have never submitted this bill to a committee of conference. It does not seem to me that the House committee can consider the questions involved in this bill itself until the House has acted on those questions. Therefore, it seems to me, with all due deference to other gentleman, that the motion originally made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was the true motion, that a committee of Senators be appointed, who shall take up these questions of difference between the Senate and the House and brush them aside, and then take up the bill and decide the question whether we shall recede from our amendments here in the Senate, or whether we shall insist upon them and ask for a conference with reference to them.

Mr. FERRY. I remind the Senator from Iowa that the Senate is not responsible for the action of the House. The House have seen fit to return this bill to the Senate. The Senator from Iowa can construe the action of the House as he sees fit; it is substantially a declaration of non-agreement on the part of the House, and the bill has come back to the Senate. No matter for what reason, the House has seen fit to act as it pleases, and the Senate cannot criticise its action. The conferees appointed on the part of the Senate were instructed to consider a resolution passed by the House which involved the question of disagreement between the two Houses, on the votes of the respective Houses, which were on the original bill as passed by the House and the amendments on the part of the Senate. I state to the Senator from Iowa that the questions of disagreement on the different amendments were considered in the conference of the two committees, and there was a disposition on the part of a portion of the conferees of the House to consider in a proper temper the disagreement upon those votes, but the majority finally were not willing to take a vote upon the merits, were not willing to agree to or consider the merits of the disagreement. Therefore, they joined in the report that is now before the Senate for its action.

It seems to me that there is no other course for the Senate to pursue. As the Senate has made two trials on the question of privilege, and failed to reconcile the two Houses on that question, the proposition now is to accept or agree to the report made by the Senate committee, and to ask for a new committee of conference on the disagreeing votes upon the amendments made on the part of the Senate. The Senator from Iowa will see that the Senator from Ohio with that view proposes to instruct the committee on two of the propositions involved in the amendments adopted by the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, may I ask the Senator from Michigan a question?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Am I correct in understanding the Senator to state that this bill with the amendments was before the committee of conference?

Mr. FERRY. It was.

Mr. ALLISON. Properly before the committee?

Mr. FERRY. It was before the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. The House insisted that certain amendments in this bill made by the Senate were in the nature of revenue measures, and, therefore, could not originate in the Senate. Was that the point? Did they point out those amendments?

Mr. FERRY. They were pointed out, a portion of them. On the part of the Senate, the Senate conferees proposed to surrender some, but the Senate would not surrender all, to which the House took exception.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; the Senate agreed to surrender a portion of those amendments.

Mr. FERRY. Did not agree, but proposed.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean proposed to do so, and the House was not willing to accept that concession unless others should be surrendered. It seems to me that perhaps if another committee of conference was agreed to on this question of privilege the next committee could agree.

Mr. FERRY. That is the very point I suggested to the Senator from Ohio, that if the Senate appoints a new committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses—the House will doubtless follow in meeting the Senate in appointing a committee of conference—that new committee may be able to consider the merits of the different amendments. If we can do so, in my judgment there will be an agreement or a flat disagreement on the amendments that are pending between the two Houses.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President——

Mr. WITHERS. Will my friend from Maryland yield to me a moment? I wish merely to suggest to the Senate that the rules which are laid down in our Manual, as it seems to me, provide for exactly the condition of things in which we find ourselves now. It is certainly true that there has been no disagreement by the committee of conference on the details of the bill which was submitted to them from the House. They refused to consider the merits of the question entirely, but declared that there had been an invasion of their privileges, and consequently took no notice whatever of the amendments of the Senate. That being the case, it strikes me that the only remedy for it under parliamentary law is to call a committee of conference, a simple conference, not a full and free conference, but a conference whose functions shall be restricted precisely to a consideration and settlement of the question of the privileges of the two bodies. I find in the Manual that committees of this kind are called for various purposes, and among those enumerated is:

When a conference is asked the subject of it must be expressed, or the conference is not agreed to. (Ord. H. Com., 89; 1 Grey, 425; 3 Grey, 31.) They are sometimes asked to inquire concerning an offense or default of a member of the other house, (6 Grey, 181; 1 Chand., 304;) or the failure of the other house to present to the king a bill passed by both houses, (8 Grey, 302;) or an information received and relating to the safety of the nation, (10 Grey, 171;) or when the methods of Parliament are thought by the one house to have been departed from by the other a conference is asked, to come to a right understanding thereon.

The latter is precisely the case now under consideration. There is a difference of opinion between the two Houses as to their respective rights, one House believing that they have been departed from by the other; and it strikes me that the only mode of settlement now is to ask for a conference upon that specific question, and let the conferees examine it and report upon it.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, if a resolution of that character were offered, I should make no objection to it, because that would be to consider this question of privilege. The other proposition, that of the Senator from Vermont, is the most common one in parliamentary usage; that is, when a question of this sort arises, to submit it to a select committee of the body; and that I should vote for in preference to any other proposition.

But, Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senate back to the exact condition of this question. Without taking up time, the Senate remembers that the bill came here, was amended here, went to the House, the amendments were not considered, the House passed a resolution sending the bill back and raising the question that our amendments to it infringed the privileges of the House. We thereupon insisted upon our amendments. We requested a committee of conference. We appointed a committee of conference. The House did likewise. Those committees met. They could not agree, and they asked for another committee of conference in the hope of an agreement. On their request, a second committee of conference was appointed and it met the managers on the part of the House, and the managers on the part of the House stood upon the resolution of June 14 of the House, which limited the inquiry to the question whether we had not invaded its privileges. They stood upon that. They would discuss nothing else; they had no power whatever to consider any other question but that single question raised by the resolution of their House. Consequently a disagreement on that subject took place between the two committees. Both committees reported to their respective Houses their failure to agree, and neither committee of conference asked for a new committee; neither one of them recommended any action on the part of the body which they represented. Consequently, the proposition before us now is to agree that there can be no agreement. That is the report. They do not ask for any further conference. They report that they cannot agree, and there ends the whole case. That report was made to the House of Representatives on the 18th of June. The House agreed to that report, and considered therefore that the proposition between the two Houses was at an end, was not to be further discussed. That report was concurred in.

Then, Mr. President, as you will see, a resolution was offered with a view to raise a new committee of conference, offered by Mr. WADDELL. The point of order was made distinctly, the very point of order which the Senator from New York considers to have nothing in it, that the House not having disagreed to the amendments of the Senate there were no amendments before them upon which a conference committee could be raised. Mr. CARLISLE made that very point, and Mr. BANKS, the former Speaker of the House, concurred that it was a good point. Then a motion was made to suspend the rules to offer a resolution reopening this question, so that it could be conferred upon between the two Houses, and upon the motion to suspend the rules to enlarge the powers of the committee what was the vote? I ask the attention of the Senate to that fact to show what a delusive hope that is of the Senator from Michigan when he holds out to us the idea that the House is going to recede from the position it has taken in regard to its privilege. When that motion to suspend the rules was voted on, two-thirds did not vote for it; and by mistake on account of my eyesight I before gave the wrong vote. I supposed there was more than a majority for the motion, but not two-thirds. I find, however, on looking at the record where the vote is given that I accidentally had taken another vote. The House divided, and the ayes were 67 and the noes were 85. So not only did not the motion to suspend the rule and take up the resolution get a two-third vote, but by a majority of twenty-odd the House refused to suspend the rule; and now we are told that we ought to send over there again and ask for a committee of conference upon a question which has been met with a final order by such gentlemen as Mr. BANKS, the former Speaker of the House, upon the very ground that there is nothing to confer upon except that single question of privilege. Until we send a resolution asking for a conference upon that question, we lower ourselves by proposing any consideration of the amendments which the House has refused even to look at.

Now, Mr. President, the hour is late and this subject will give latitude to greater discussion. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY. I hope not. I hope we shall take the vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Maryland to allow me before the vote is taken either way to say that as soon as I can get the floor for that purpose I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the resolutions that I presented on the subject of the constitutional amendments.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not yield my motion.

CHOCTAW CLAIM.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before putting the motion of the Senator from Maryland the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copies of a report and accompanying papers, received from the Secretary of the Interior, upon a communication addressed to the President of the United States in behalf of a certain claim of the Choctaw Nation, arising under the provisions of the Choctaw and Chickasaw treaty of June 22, 1855.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 24, 1879.

The message was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1435) authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 4200) relating to the National Road in the State of Maryland, and to give consent of the United States to a certain act of the General Assembly of Maryland in relation to said road;

A bill (H. R. No. 5052) to amend section 3835 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6141) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes, and to appropriate $40,000 for the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. W. A. J. SPARKS of Illinois, Mr. O. R. SINGLETON of Mississippi, and Mr. JOHN H. BAKER of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 5655) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1878;

A bill (H. R. No. 5808) to facilitate the refunding the national debt;

A bill (S. No. 1242) to repeal section 1233 of the Revised Statutes, relating to company cooks in the Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WHYTE. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to make a report in order to get a matter to another committee?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHYTE. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I report from the Committee on the Judiciary the petition of Eli Ayres, of the State of Texas, praying the passage of a law to quiet titles to certain lands alleged to have been purchased by him under the Chickasaw treaty of May 24, 1834, or that he may be reimbursed the amount of money, with interest, alleged to have been paid for said lands. This petition, in the opinion of the committee, presents a matter that strictly and appropriately belongs to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I therefore move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Joint Committee on Army Reorganization and Reform, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (S. No. 1491) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to present six petitions on the subject of the arrears of pension bill that ought to have been presented some days ago, but owing to my absence have not been. I now present these petitions, signed by some six hundred of the soldiers of Illinois, and ask that they be received and lie on the table, as the bill has passed during my absence.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I have several petitions of the same character that I should like to present to go to the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions will be received and lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1701) to carry out the stipulations of certain treaties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1702) to permit E. C. Boudinot, of the Cherokee Nation, to sue in the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1703) granting $2,000 to G. E. W. Sharretts as compensation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1704) to make rules for the government and regulation of the land forces of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MERRIMON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

POST-ROUTE BILL—REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. WHYTE. I insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WHYTE. I will yield for an executive session if any one wants it.

The Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 24.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FERRY. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 24.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the vote will be taken on my motion. I have made some modification of the resolution since it was up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] which will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the whole resolution be read also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the report of the second committee of conference made by Mr. KIRKWOOD, June 18, 1878, on the resolution of the House of Representatives returning to the Senate the bill of the House (No. 4286) to establish post-routes in the several States herein named, and further insist upon its amendments to the said bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is to add:

And that the conferees to be appointed on the part of the Senate be instructed to agree to strike out the amendment of the Senate relating to the franking privilege added by way of proviso to the 11th section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, after hearing the discussion and after reflection I think it a duty to move that this resolution with all its amendments be referred to a select committee of five Senators, of whom I shall not be one, but of course I do not make that a part of the motion.

Mr. BLAINE. Is that in order pending a motion for a conference. Can a motion of as high a privilege as that for a conference be superseded in this way?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that it may be referred under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can refer the resolution, certainly.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senate will vote down the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the whole subject-matter be referred to a select committee of five.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 21.

THIRTEENTH, FOURTEENTH, AND FIFTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions I have referred to that I offered on the subject of the constitutional amendments.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is moved that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 27 and the noes 21.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMLIN. I refrained from voting when the Senate divided, as I shall when the yeas and nays are called. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and myself are paired upon political questions, and I am rather inclined to think this is one.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. What is the question, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND. That is right. I vote "nay."

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, on this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD.]

Mr. MITCHELL. I refrained from voting from the fact that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] asked me to pair with him on this question. He now informs me that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. MERRIMON. This seems to be regarded as a political question, and I therefore feel constrained to observe my pair with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] who is absent under order of the Senate on business, is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER,] and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] who is absent under a similar order of the Senate, is paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.] The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] is paired with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.]

Mr. GARLAND. We have got to a point where I want to know whether this motion to adjourn is a political question. I voted against the adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You vote the same way that Mr. KIRKWOOD would have voted; so you are not in any danger of violating the pair.

Mr. GARLAND. If it is a political question I will withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not the province of the Chair to determine that.

Mr. GARLAND. I voted against adjournment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. WALLACE.]

Mr. DAWES, (who had voted in the negative.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BARNUM,] and if this has taken that turn I beg leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. If this is a political question I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CONOVER,] and therefore shall not vote.

Mr. BAILEY. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON.] I do not regard this as a political question, but apprehensive that others may so consider it I have declined to vote and still decline.

Mr. PADDOCK. On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] I have refrained from voting for that reason.

Mr. EATON. I have voted but I ought to say here that the Senator from Vermont asked me whether I would not pair with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] I was paired with the Senator from Michigan by request of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] the day before yesterday and yesterday, but I understand from the Senator from South Carolina that the pair was broken by him this morning, and, therefore, I voted.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—24.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question recurs now on the motion pending to proceed to the consideration of my resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 24.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is lost.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 25, noes 25.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is lost. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. McCREERY. Is that proposition amendable?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir. A motion to proceed to the consideration of particular business cannot be amended.

Mr. McCREERY. I would appeal to the courtesy of the Senator from Vermont and the courtesy of the Senate if it is not proper under the circumstances to proceed with the consideration of the claim of Warren Mitchell which was before this body yesterday. Various speeches have been made in opposition to it, and it was superseded by a motion to take up the business we have just transacted. I think in all fairness the Senate at this time ought to accord to this claim the privilege of being proceeded with. I hope the Senator from Vermont will under the circumstances consider this matter and make a favorable reply.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. McCREERY. I move to lay that proposition of the Senator from Vermont on the table in order to take up the bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the motion of the Senator from Vermont be laid upon the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill cannot be laid on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Kentucky to move to lay this motion on the table. The Chair rules that that is in order.

Mr. VOORHEES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MERRIMON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I desire to say that on this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.]

Mr. DAWES. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BARNUM.] Otherwise I should have voted "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. WALLACE.]

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

Mr. MAXEY. I was requested to announce the pair of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] with my colleague, [Mr. COKE.] If present, my colleague would vote "yea" and the Senator from California "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 24; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas have it. The motion of the Senator from Vermont is laid on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions I had the honor to offer the other day. The former motion having been laid on the table, I move it again.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. WALLACE.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MERRIMON. This seems to be treated as a political vote. I therefore feel constrained to observe my pair with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. PADDOCK. On this question I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] The Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] is paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.]

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 24, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WILLIAM BAIN.

Mr. DIBRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6148) directing the pension agent at Knoxville, Tennessee, to pay William Bain his pension under the act of March 9, 1878; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BRAUNINGER.

Mr. DIBRELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6149) for the relief of William Brauninger, late private Company H, Twentieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PETER A. ALLENDORF.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am directed by the Committee of Claims to report back the bill (H. R. No. 4008) for the relief of Peter A. Allendorf, which was referred to that committee by mistake, and to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ARCTIC EXPLORATION—THE SHIP JEANNETTE.

Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6150) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept, for the purposes of a voyage of exploration by way of Behring Strait, the ship Jeannette, tendered by James Gordon Bennett for that purpose; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DR. JUNIUS L. POWELL.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, Senate bill No. 1435, authorizing the appointment of Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army.

The bill authorizes the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Dr. Junius L. Powell an assistant surgeon in the United States Army, with the rank of first lieutenant, to date from June 6, 1878; said Powell to be relieved from the operation of the twenty-eighth section of the act of July 28, 1866, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDON C. MILLER.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6151) granting a pension to Landon C. EQUALIZATION OF INTERNAL TAXES.

Mr. FULLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Whereas the burdens of the internal tax are so distributed as to impose upon five States of the Union, to wit: Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Kentucky and Virginia, nearly one-half of the entire tax, by an unjust and onerous discrimination: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, directed to consider the feasibility of the enactment of a law which shall equalize the internal-revenue tax among all the States of the Union.

JOSEPH LAUNDRIE.

Mr. STEWART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6152) granting a pension to Joseph Laundrie; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ALBERT Z. NORTON.

Mr. STEWART also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6153) granting a pension to Albert Z. Norton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES B. WHITE.

Mr. SOUTHARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6154) granting a pension to James B. White, of Zanesville, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM CHRISTY.

Mr. CUMMINGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6155) for the relief of William Christy, late of the Eighth Iowa Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SESSION FOR BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. By direction of the Committee on Commerce, I ask unanimous consent that Wednesday evening next, at half past seven o'clock, be set apart for the consideration of reports from that committee.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does the gentleman intend then to report the river and harbor bill?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; this is for the ordinary business of the committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DUTIES ON SUGAR.

Mr. ROBBINS. On behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, I ask consent that to-morrow after the morning hour be set apart for the consideration of the bill which has been agreed upon by that committee to regulate the duties on sugar.

The SPEAKER. The post-office appropriation bill has been set for to-morrow. The gentleman had better say "subject to appropriation bills."

Mr. ROBBINS. This bill will take some time; and I will say Wednesday next at half past one o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] under instruction from the Committee of Ways and Means, asks consent that Wednesday next after half past one o'clock be set apart for the purpose of enabling the Committee of Ways and Means to report and have considered a bill to regulate the duties on sugar.

Mr. BANKS. I must object to that.

Mr. MILLS. If we make this order, will the bill be considered in the Committee of the Whole or under what rules will it be considered? I understand the Chair to hold that by making an order of this kind we suspend all rules.

The SPEAKER. The bill at the time appointed for its consideration would be considered subject to the ordinary rules of the House; but when the House by unanimous consent (which is equivalent to a suspension of the rules) votes to consider a bill at a particular time, it is absolutely required of the House to consider it then; and if it desires to get rid of the bill it must take some other method than by raising the question of consideration.

Mr. ROBBINS. I hope nobody will object to assigning a time for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] insist on his objection?

Mr. BANKS. I do.

Mr. ROBBINS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection and allow the subject to be considered.

Mr. BANKS. At present I will not withdraw my objection. I am opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then let us consider and pass, if a majority of the House so desires, the proposition of the minority of the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD. It has been understood in the Committee of Ways and Means that any proposition may be offered as an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, objects to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS.]

SAMUEL KELLY.

Mr. EDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on War Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of Samuel Kelly, of Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

HEIRS OF GEORGE V. NEAL.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6156) to amend an act for the relief of the heirs of George V. Neal; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CLASSIFICATION OF MAIL MATTER.

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Speaker, by the adjournment of the House last night without disposing of the bill for the classification of mail matter and the rates of postage thereon, that bill has lost its place; and I desire to ask unanimous consent for another assignment for the consideration of that bill on the earliest possible day. It is hardly worth while to have a night session, for nobody attends such sessions. I would like a day session for the consideration of this measure. I therefore ask that Thursday next, after the reading of the Journal, be assigned for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Subject to appropriation bills?

Mr. WADDELL. Of course.

Mr. HAYES. I object.

Mr. WADDELL. Does the gentleman object to any special assignment for this bill.

Mr. HAYES. I do; I am opposed to the bill.

DEFICIENCIES IN THE POSTMASTER'S ACCOUNTS.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask unanimous consent that an amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5052) to amend section 3835 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be taken up and concurred in. There is merely a verbal amendment to the title.

There being no objection, the following amendment of the Senate was read and concurred in:

Amend the title of House bill No. 5052, so as to read: "An act to amend section 3835 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to deficiencies in Postmaster's accounts."

Mr. WADDELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. No. 6141) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes, and to appropriate $40,000 for the miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL C. REID.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Samuel C. Reid in behalf of the heirs of claimants for compensation for the destruction of the private armed brig General Armstrong by the British fleet during the war of 1812; and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ROBERT H. YOUNG.

Mr. BRIGHT also, from the same committee, reported back papers relating to the claim of Robert H. Young; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM LAVERY.

Mr. BRIGHT also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 4433) for the relief of William Lavery; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Friday and Saturday evenings of next week be set apart for the consideration of the Private Calendar, the same to be considered as objection days.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. SEXTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6157) to amend section 563, paragraph 15 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the jurisdiction of district courts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. SEXTON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6158) to amend paragraph 10 of section 629 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the jurisdiction of circuit courts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ELISHA FRANKLIN.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a few moments I have a favor to ask and I hope there will not be any objection on either side of the House to granting it. There has been referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the war of 1812 a claim of a gentleman from the State of Virginia, and that committee has not been called to report since last May, and I do not know whether they will be reached during the remainder of the present session or not. But, sir, I have a short report here which I desire to make and I hope there will be no objection to receiving it and passing the bill. The claimant is now one hundred years old.

There was no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6159) granting a bounty land warrant to Elisha Franklin, a survivor of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land to Elisha Franklin, of Russell County, Virginia, a survivor of the war of 1812, in accordance with the act of March 3, 1855.

Mr. MACKEY. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The standing Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Elisha Franklin, of the county of Russell, and State of Virginia, would respectfully report: that the petitioner sets forth that he served as a private in Captain Thomas Burwell's company, Virginia militia, in the war of 1812; that he was enrolled and called by the name of Elijah, Lijah, or Lige Franklin, and is known by said name by his neighbors in Virginia where he was raised and is still known by said name by the older class of citizens up to the date of his petition, but his correct name is Elisha Franklin; that his application is for one hundred and sixty acres of bounty land under the act of March 3, 1855. There is no doubt he served as a private in the war of 1812, and would long since have been the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of land but for the error in his name. That when he applied to Congress for a grant of land in 1872 he was ninety-three years old, and if we add seven years since the date of his application it will bring him at this time to the good old age of one hundred years, and the committee think if the old gentleman wants to clear and cultivate the land and make a farmer of himself he cannot well afford to put off the time much longer, and they therefore ask leave to report a bill granting the petitioner one hundred and sixty acres of land agreeably to the prayer of the petition.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. RICHARDSON.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6160) granting a pension to William H. Richardson, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN called for the regular order of business, but subsequently withdrew the call.

DES MOINES RAPIDS CANAL.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3366) to authorize the Canal Dry-Dock and Manufacturing Company to construct and operate dry-docks in connection with the Des Moines Rapids Canal, and for other purposes, and moved that it be laid on the table and that the accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN H. SCOTT.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6161) for the relief of John H. Scott, of Knox County, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL ROAD IN MARYLAND.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 4200) relating to the National Road in the State of Maryland, and to give consent of the United States to a certain act of the General Assembly of Maryland in relation to said road, which has been returned by the Senate with an amendment, be taken from the Speaker's table, that I may move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

At the end of line 7 insert:

Provided, That this consent shall have no effect in respect of creating or recognizing any duty or liability whatever on the part of the United States.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES J. MURPHY.

Mr. VEEDER, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6162) for the relief of Charles J. Murphy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 829, REVISED STATUTES OF 1878.

Mr. ALDRICH, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6163) to amend section 829, title 13, of the Revised Statutes of 1878; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 4458, REVISED STATUTES OF 1878.

Mr. ALDRICH also, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6164) to amend section 4458, title 53, of the Revised Statutes of 1878; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 4585, REVISED STATUTES OF 1878.

Mr. ALDRICH also, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6165) to amend section 4585, title 53, of the Revised Statutes of 1878; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS UNDER INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to ask that the bill (H. R. No. 5047) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to all claims growing out of treaties between the United States and Indian tribes and the laws pertaining thereto be made a special order for Wednesday, the 5th day of February.

The SPEAKER. Is the bill in committee?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The bill is on the Calendar in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Let me make a single statement, after hearing which I am sure the gentleman will not object. The committee has unanimously instructed me to make this request. If the bill passes Congress it will take from Congress all these claims which are continually coming up for its action and transfer them to the Court of Claims.

Mr. EDEN. The same action in reference to all other sorts of claims would result in the same way. I must object.

ACCOMMODATION OF LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to report back the bill (H. R. No. 5896) to provide permanent accommodation for the Library of Congress and to ask that it be assigned as a special order for the first Tuesday of February after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That day is disposed of.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well; say Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Subject to appropriation bills?

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir. I desire also to suggest that any amendments which it is proposed to offer to this bill ought to be sent in and printed. I hope leave will be given for that purpose.

Mr. SAYLER. Let the assignment be after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there will be no morning hour on Thursday next, on account of the position of the business of the Committee on Appropriations. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York had better take a later day.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well; I will say the first Saturday in February.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to hear the title of the bill again read.

The title of the bill was again read.

Mr. EDEN. Will that bill be open to amendments?

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly; and I ask unanimous consent that any amendments sent to the desk may be printed, and that they be voted on subject only to points of order.

Mr. EDEN. Will the order which is proposed by the gentleman from New York suspend the rules, so that points of order will not lie?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has stated he is willing that all points of order be reserved.

There being no objection, the bill was made the special order for the first Saturday in February after the morning hour; and leave was granted for printing proposed amendments to the bill.

Mr. COOK and Mr. HALE submitted amendments to be printed under the order just made.

RECORDS AND FILES OF THE UNITED STATES COURTS IN TEXAS.

On motion of Mr. REAGAN, the bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire, returned from the Senate with amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TENTH CENSUS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to report back from the Committee on the Census a bill to provide for taking the Federal census, and I desire to have it set down for a particular day, the second Tuesday of February, and continued from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Subject to the appropriation bills?

Mr. COX, of New York. I may want to raise the question of consideration upon them.

The SPEAKER. Then the House will understand the fact that the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that on the second Tuesday in February he be allowed to report from the Committee on the Census for consideration, after the reading of the Journal, a bill to provide for the taking of the next census. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. All points of order are reserved.

Mr. PRICE. It is not to interfere with or antagonize the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York does not say that.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is a more important bill than any appropriation bill, and I will test the sense of the House upon it. I am sure the House will give consent to the committee to make this report.

Mr. BURCHARD. There is a reservation of all points of order upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The request which the gentleman from New York now makes would require unanimous consent.

Mr. COX, of New York. I see that, and that is my embarrassment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman had better allow the appropriation bills to be exempted from the effect of the order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well; I suppose that is the best I can do.

Mr. SAYLER. I hope the gentleman will make the order come up after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has obtained the same right, excepting perhaps as to the day. The Chair will state the proposition again. The gentleman from New York asks consent that upon the second Tuesday in February he be allowed to report from the Committee on the Census the bill that that committee desires to report in reference to the taking of the next census, immediately after the reading of the Journal, subject, however, to the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. I reserve the same point of order which I might make now, which would send the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to report the bill now.

The bill (H. R. No. 6144) to provide for taking the Federal census was read a first and second time.

Mr. BURCHARD. What is done with the bill which was set down for consideration? I understood the gentleman to say that he reported it now.

The SPEAKER. It is reported now, and will come up for consideration on the day fixed.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has already reported the census bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has reserved all points of order.

Mr. BURCHARD. I thought the permission was to report it on the day fixed for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the reporting of the bill gives it no advantage; certainly none is intended.

FOLKES & WINSTON, AND OTHERS.

Mr. CABELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1654, the bill (H. R. No. 6166) for the relief of Folkes & Winston, and others, for compensation for property taken and destroyed during the late war; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

STATE WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3288) to declare the intent and meaning of an act approved July 27, 1861, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour commences at seven minutes to one o'clock.

EXPENSES OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE. I have a bill in which the House is interested, providing for the expenses of investigating committees, that has come back from the Senate, and I would like to have it passed; I think the House would like to have it passed.

Mr. EDEN. I withdraw the call for the regular order absolutely.

Mr. HALE. Then I report from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. No. 6141) making appropriations to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of section 254 of the Revised Statutes, and to appropriate $40,000 for miscellaneous expenses of the House of Representatives, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out the word "charges" in line 5 and insert "amount paid."

After line 3 insert:

That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; which sum shall be placed to the credit of the contingent fund of the Senate, to be applied toward defraying the expenses of such investigations and inquiries as have already been, or may hereafter be, directed by the Senate during the Forty-fifth Congress.

After line 13 insert:

For expenses of the joint committee to take into consideration the subject-matter of reform and reorganization of the Army, $232.67.

For expenses of the joint committee to take into consideration the expediency of transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department, $953.60.

Amend the title by adding at the end thereof the words, "and for other purposes."

Mr. HALE. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN SAN MATEO COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. ATKINS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will now begin at four minutes before one o'clock. The first business in the morning hour of to-day, being Friday, is the unfinished business coming over from last private bill day. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 4886) to authorize the correction of boundaries of certain lands in San Mateo County, California, was taken up, and is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any and all persons claiming land the title of which was derived through the grant of the Mexican authorities to Juan Coppinger, known as the Cañada de Raimando rancho, situated in San Mateo County, in the State of California, and which lands are alleged to have been erroneously included in the survey, location, and patent of the Pulgas rancho, in said county, contrary to the boundaries originally designated by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered at the December term, 1855, of said court, shall have the right to contest the said location in their own names, without leaving the State, by suit in chancery in the circuit court of the United States, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court; and said courts are hereby given jurisdiction of the same and authorized to correct the said boundaries and to reform the patents to either or both of said ranchos, if they shall be found not to be in conformity with the decree of the Supreme Court, and to give such other and further relief as equity and justice may require.

The United States and all persons having an interest in the subject-matter of said suit or in the adjustment of the lines of the patents, if determined upon by the court, shall be made parties defendant; and any party defendant may rely upon any legal or equitable defense except the lapse of time during which the opposite party had, under existing laws, no remedy in the courts; and either party may appeal to the higher Federal courts and on up to the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. PAGE. The committee from which this bill was reported has already had two morning hours.

The SPEAKER. That does not make any difference. This bill not being disposed of might run for twenty morning hours.

Mr. PAGE. Is this the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. It is. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] moved to lay the bill on the table, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] called the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. PAGE. How does that make it unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state why it is not.

Mr. PAGE. The previous question has not been sustained.

The SPEAKER. That does not matter; it has been demanded, and the gentleman himself has made the only motion pending which could interfere with the previous question, and that was a motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. PAGE. If the parties having charge of this bill will permit the discussion on its merits to go on until the expiration of the morning hour, and then move the previous question——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] made the proposition that one-half of the hour after the previous question was ordered on the bill should be given to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. GUNTER. That is correct.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague [Mr. DAVIS] desires to offer an amendment to the bill. If the gentleman having charge of the bill will allow it to be offered——

The SPEAKER. That is a matter within the control of the House.

Mr. PAGE. It cannot be offered after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I appeal to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] to withdraw the demand for the previous question. This is a matter of great importance. This bill involves to a certain extent all the land titles in California, and directly involves property to the amount of over $2,000,000. It cannot be adequately discussed in thirty minutes.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I deny that it involves all the land titles in California, except perhaps incidentally.

Mr. PAGE. I made the motion to lay the bill on the table. I will withdraw it in the hope that the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] will allow me to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 66, noes 80.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I move to amend the bill by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no question heretofore settled by adjudication of the courts of the United States and the State of California, conformably to the laws thereof respectively, shall be again opened for consideration under the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] now calls the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] has not yet yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the purpose of the House in voting down the call for the previous question was to allow an amendment to be offered.

Mr. HALE. And also to allow debate; that was the understanding with which we voted against the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection. The practice of the House has been that where the purpose was plainly indicated, by voting down the previous question, of allowing an amendment to be offered, then when offered the possession of the bill by the committee is not lost.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman who had charge of the bill loses control of the floor.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but at the end of the hour the bill will go back to him again.

Mr. HALE. And for the present the gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] would control the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. This is a bill which involves simply a dispute in reference to the boundaries of two ranchos in the State of California. It is an effort to destroy a United States patent to land which was issued in 1857, twenty-two years ago.

The grant to the original parties was made by the Mexican government in the year 1835. It was litigated in 1853 before the land commissioner of California. In 1854 it passed through the district court of the United States, and in 1855 it was finally confirmed by the Supreme Court. In 1856 it was surveyed by the United States surveyor-general, and a petition was made to the district court to enjoin the issuance of the patent on the ground that the boundaries were incorrectly laid out by that survey. The petition for injunction was refused. A patent was then issued and a suit for ejectment was brought in the United States district court, which was decided in favor of the patentees. That suit was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, which confirmed the action of the district court in 1860. Upon that suit was again brought by the patentees in the State courts to quiet title. It was decided in their favor in the district court of the State, was appealed to the State supreme court, and finally adjudicated there in the year 1864, the court affirming the decision of the lower court. This question passed through no less than nine different litigations and in every case the decision was in favor of the patentees and in favor of the grant.

Shortly after this the matter was brought into Congress. It has been reported upon adversely in the Forty-third and the Forty-fourth Congress. In the last Congress, the Forty-fourth, a very able report was made upon this subject by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CANDLER,] from the Committee on Private Land Claims, which I ask to have read as a portion of my remarks.

Mr. WIGGINTON. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. He is certainly mistaken in saying that this measure was reported against in the Forty-third Congress. The House committee in the Forty-third Congress reported in favor of it.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. In the Forty-third Congress there was an adverse report in the Senate. I ask the Clerk to read the report submitted in this House in the Forty-fourth Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 1308) to authorize the correction of the boundaries of certain lands in San Mateo County, California, have considered the same, and make the following report:

On the 27th of November, 1835, the Mexican government granted to the children of Louis Arguello a tract of land called "Los Pulgas," situate in what is now the county of San Mateo, in California, the boundaries of which were specified in the grant in the following words:

"On the south the creek of San Francisquito; on the north, that of San Mateo; on the east, the estuaries; and on the west, the Cañada de Raimando."

In a subsequent part of the grant are these words:

"The tract of which mention is made is of four leagues of latitude and one of longitude."

Under the act of Congress of March 3, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," the Arguello children, on the 21st of January, 1852, filed their petition with the commissioners under said act, in which they claimed confirmation of their title to a rancho situated in the county of San Francisco and State of California, the quantity unknown, but supposed to contain about twelve square leagues, lying on the bay of San Francisco, between the creeks called San Mateo and San Francisquito, and extending back to the Sierra, or range of mountains.

On the 12th of October, 1853, the commissioners aforesaid confirmed the claim of the Arguellos substantially in the language of the Mexican grant, and added the words "said grant being of the extent of four leagues in length and one in breadth, be the same more or less."

From this decree the case was removed to the district court of the northern district of California, where the decree of the commissioners was confirmed. Afterward an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in that court, at December term, 1855, (18 Howard Reports, 544,) it was adjudged that the judgment of the district court was correct, and that the claim of the petitioners was valid as to that portion of the land described in their petition, bounded as follows: "On the south by the arrejo or creek of San Francisquito; on the north by the creek of San Mateo; on the east by the esteros or waters of the bay of San Francisco; and on the west by the eastern borders of the valley known as the Cañada de Raimando; said land being of the extent of four leagues in length and one in breadth, be the same more or less." And then it was further decreed that as to the portion of the premises described in said petition which is not included within the boundaries above mentioned, the claim of the petitioners is adjudged not to be valid. The land included in the petition and thus excluded by this judgment is that extending west from the eastern borders of the valley of Raimando to the Sierra, or range of mountains, or the valley of Raimando.

After this judgment of confirmation by the Supreme Court the land was surveyed by the surveyor-general for California, and the survey having been returned to and approved by the General Land Office on the 2d day of October, 1857, a patent in the usual form was issued to the confirmers, describing the land as surveyed and as described in the final decree of confirmation on the north, south, and east; and the west side the line is along the western base of the hills which bound on the east the valley of Raimando.

On the 4th day of August, 1840, there was granted by the Mexican government to Juan Coppinger the place known as Cañada de Raimando, bordering on the west by the Sierra Morena; on the east by the Rancho de los Pulgas; on the south by that of Señor Maximo Martinez, and on the north with the lagoon. This grant was made on the petition of Juan Coppinger for "a small valley which lies in the Sierra, in the same place where there now is a timber-cutting establishment; which place is about two and one-half leagues in length and about three-quarters of a league in breadth at the most; said valley borders on the rancho of Dn. Solidad Ortega and that of Maximo Martinez, and also on the Sierra, at the extremity, as it appears from the accompanying sketch."

Juan Coppinger having died, leaving as his heirs at law an infant child, Manuela Coppinger, and his widow, Maria Louisa Coppinger, who afterward became the wife of John Greer, they filed their petition with the board of land commissioners in California, praying that the title to the Cañada de Raimando might be confirmed to them as the heirs at law of the said Juan Coppinger. On the 29th of November, 1853, confirmation was made by the land commissioners to the petitioners, Maria Louisa Greer and Manuela Coppinger, to the land as described in the original grant to Juan Coppinger.

On appeal to the district court for the northern district of California, on the 14th day of January, 1856, the claim of petitioners was again confirmed, describing the land as known as the Cañada de Raimando, "bordering to the west on the Sierra Morena; to the east on the rancho de los Pulgas; to the south on the rancho of Marino Martinez; and to the north on the great lagoon."

This decree became final and was officially surveyed, and on the 19th day of July, 1859, a patent issued to the confirmers for the land as surveyed, the eastern line being coterminous with the western line of the survey and patent of Los Pulgas.

It is now alleged by certain persons claiming portions of the land included in the Los Pulgas survey and patent, under titles derived through the grant by the Mexican authorities to Juan Coppinger, known as the Cañada de Raimando rancho, that the lands claimed by them were erroneously included in the survey and patent of the Pulgas rancho, and is contrary to the boundaries as designated by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States confirming said Los Pulgas grant; and the bill referred to is to authorize the said persons to contest in the courts of the United States the location of the said Los Pulgas grant, and to correct its surveyed and patented boundaries if not in conformity to the decree of confirmation by the Supreme Court.

It is claimed that the said survey and patent does not conform to the final decree of confirmation in this, that, by the terms of said decree, the western limit of the survey should have been located at the distance of one league from the waters of the bay of San Francisco, and should only have included an area of four square leagues, whereas, in fact, the said western line is much more than one league from the waters of said bay, and includes more than seven square leagues.

The Arguella children, in their petition, asked to be confirmed in their title to about twelve square leagues of land, extending from the bay of San Francisco west to the Sierra or range of mountains which would include the valley of Raimando. Under the decree of confirmation by the Supreme Court, the claim to the valley of Raimando was declared to be invalid, and the boundaries of the grant were fixed by natural objects; that on the west by the eastern borders of that valley, and in the use of the words, "said land being of the extent of four leagues in length and one in breadth, be the same more or less," intended the same as descriptive of the land, and not as a limit of its quantity.

If these words had been intended to limit the quantity to four leagues in length and one in breadth, it is to be presumed the court, instead of negativing that intention by the qualifying words, "be the same more or less," would have so declared in express terms.

The western lines of the Los Pulgas survey, which is the eastern line of the Coppinger survey, is along the base of the hills east of the valley Raimando. So that if the construction of the Supreme Court decree, which fixes the western boundary at the uniform distance of one league from the waters of the bay of San Francisco be true, then the call for the western boundary as being along the eastern borders of the Cañada Raimando made in this decree yielded, and the eastern boundary of the Coppinger grant, survey, and patent is moved west nearly one league, and the grant is put west of the valley of the Raimando, and can only include it by covering a tract of land nearly five leagues in length and two in breadth; whereas by the petition of Juan Coppinger, upon which the grant was made, the granting of a small valley about two and a half leagues in length and about three-quarters of a league in breadth, was asked for, and, under a grant to the place known as the Cañada de Raimando, would include a hill country west of it greater in quantity than that valley.

If the boundaries of the land described by the distances mentioned in the grant, the gratifying words, "be the same more or less," being omitted, did not correspond with those prescribed by the natural and permanent object named, then they would have to yield under that rule, founded in reason and settled by authority, that when land is described in a grant by permanent objects as its boundaries and also by courses and distances, with a mention of the quantity, the description by courses, distances, and quantity must yield to those boundaries if they do not agree.

The question as to the boundary-line between those grants has been adjudicated adversely to the claimants under the Coppinger grant in every forum having jurisdiction.

Section 13 of the act of March 3, 1851, provides if a confirmed claim has been surveyed by the surveyor-general, "and the title to such lands shall be contested by any other person, it shall and may be lawful for such person to present a petition to the district judge of the United States for the district in which the lands are situated, plainly and distinctly setting forth his title thereto;" and "that it shall and may be lawful for the district judge of the United States, upon the hearing of such petition, to grant an injunction to restrain the party at whose instance the claim to said lands has been confirmed from suing out a patent for the same until the title thereto shall have been finally decided; a copy of which order shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and thereupon no patent shall issue until such decision shall be made, or until sufficient time, in the opinion of said judge, shall have been allowed for obtaining the same; and thereafter the said injunction shall be dissolved." Under this section, claimants, under the Coppinger grant, instituted proceedings to restrain the issuing of the patent to the confirmers of the Los Pulgas grant, and the injunction was denied, and from the decision no appeal was taken.

Upon the patent issued by the United States to the confirmers of the Los Pulgas grant, according to the survey as made by the surveyor-general, an action of ejectment was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California against parties in possession of a portion of the lands included in the Los Pulgas survey, who claimed title under the Coppinger grant; and a judgment was had for the plaintiffs, in the year 1858, and possession given to the proprietors of the Pulgas grant to all the lands covered by its survey and patent.

Afterward, the claimants under the Cañada de Raimando grant continuing to assert that they had some right or title to that portion of the Pulgas grant lying east of the alleged one-league line of the Pulgas grant, the owners of the latter grant, on the 22d day of January, 1862, brought suit in one of the district courts of California, under the two hundred and fifty-fourth section of the practice act of that State, against all the claimants of the Cañada de Raimando rancho, for the purpose of determining their adverse claim and for the quieting the possession and title of the plaintiffs, the Pulgas patentees.

The defendants, answering this complaint, admitted the possession of the plaintiffs to the lands covered by their survey and patent, and asserted their title to all that portion of the same lying and being westward of a line running from the creek of San Mateo to the creek of San Francisquito, at a distance of one Spanish league westerly from the waters of the bay of San Francisco, and averred that the survey of the Los Pulgas was erroneous in respect to the quantity of land embraced therein; and at most the said western line should not have been located at a greater distance than one league from the waters of the bay of San Francisco.

Upon this complaint and answer, and upon an agreement by the parties as to the facts involved in the pleadings, a judgment was rendered November 16, 1863, as follows:

"That the plaintiffs be quieted in their possession of and title to all that tract of land described in the complaint, and against any and all claims of the defendants to the same or to any part thereof: The said tract of land being all that part of the Pulgas ranch as surveyed and patented by the United States to the plaintiff and to Louis Antonio Arguello by a patent dated October 2, 1857, recorded in book 1 of patents in the office of the recorder of the county of San Mateo, at pages 1 and 12, which tract of land is bounded southwardly by the San Francisquito, westwardly by the westward line of the Pulgas ranch, as shown by said United States survey and patent; northwardly by the San Mateo Creek, and eastwardly by a line running from the San Mateo Creek to the San Francisquito Creek, at the distance of one league westwardly from the estuaries of the bay of San Francisco, and that the defendants and all claiming under them be forever barred from all claims to said tract of land or any part thereof; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the adverse claims set up by the defendants in their answer herein be determined against the defendants and be dismissed, and that they be forever barred and perpetually enjoined from setting up and asserting said claim to the premises claimed by them or any of them, and to any part thereof; and that the plaintiffs be forever quieted in their possession of and title to the same and the whole thereof against the said claim of the defendant."

Upon appeal by the defendants to the supreme court of California this judgment at the October term, 1864, was affirmed.

Nearly twenty years have elapsed since the survey, location, and patent of the Los Pulgas grant. Commencing in the year 1857 in the courts of the United States, before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in the courts of the State of California, ending in the Supreme Court of the United States in the year 1869, the dividing line between the Raimando and Los Pulgas grants has been contested by claimants under the Raimando grant, and everywhere decisions adverse to their claim have been rendered. Since these decisions many hundred persons have purchased lands which are part of the Pulgas grant, the assessed value of which is more than two millions of dollars.

While it is not believed that if these claimants were again allowed to go into the courts according to the provisions of the bill referred to your committee, and contest the correctness of the survey and patent of this grant, that its boundaries would be changed, still, the effect of reopening litigation which has long since been settled would be to disturb the title to many thousand acres of land, to greatly lessen its value—now estimated at millions of dollars—and at the same time to disquiet and unjustly to subject to heavy expense many hundreds of purchasers who have given faith to the judgments of the courts, and the patents of the Government issued under them, and generally to cloud land titles in California originating in Spanish and Mexican grants, greatly to the detriment of the State's prosperity. Wherefore your committee recommend that this bill do not pass.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Now, I ask the gentleman to have read in this connection the views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] and others upon this same subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. The gentleman can have that document read in his own time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Very well. The gentleman has not the courtesy to allow a hearing to both sides.

Mr. GUNTER. I will ask the gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] whether he intends that the morning hour shall be divided equally with our side of this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California at present has control of the hour, but the committee do not lose possession of the bill. The next hour will be assigned to the gentleman from Arkansas or some one on his side of the question.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. We will use this hour, and the gentleman from Arkansas can control the next hour.

The point is sought to be made in defense of this bill that the question of boundaries has never been fairly adjudicated in the courts. Now, that question has been brought up in every trial that has been had. In support of the correctness of the present boundaries as now maintained by the patent, I ask the Clerk to read from the decision of the California State supreme court in 1864, as alluded to in the report just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Admitting this construction of the language of the description contained in the original grant of the Los Pulgas and in the decree of confirmation to be correct, the defendants claim that the valley of the Cañada de Raimando, by fair construction, comprehends the slope of the hills forming its eastern boundary, and that as the western limit of the Los Pulgas was declared to be the Cañada de Raimando, the line between the two ranchos was at the top of these hills. Whatever force there might be in this position of the defendants, if the eastern line of the Cañada de Raimando were not already established by Government authority, is overcome in the present state of things by the fact that the Government, in a proceeding to which the defendants, or those under whom they claim, were parties, has determined the eastern boundary of the Cañada de Raimando to be at the base of the hills on the eastern border of the valley. It does not appear that any objection was made to the Government survey fixing this boundary so as to make it coincide with the western boundary-line of the Los Pulgas, as surveyed and patented. If they did so object at the proper time and before the proper authority, their objections did not prevail. The survey of the Cañada de Raimando was approved and confirmed on the part of the Government, as appears by the patent issued; and this must be regarded as conclusive upon the defendants who were parties or privies to the proceeding, and became bound by this action of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. It will be seen by the language of this decision that the supreme court of California passed expressly upon the question of boundaries, and that whatever question there might have been on that point was adjudicated by this decision, and this adjudication should be final.

But, as a last resort, this case is sought to be brought before Congress by special legislation setting aside the statute of limitations of the State and allowing this case to be placed upon a peculiar and solitary basis of its own in the courts, setting aside the rights of all parties that have accrued during twenty years of peaceful possession, and tearing up by the roots all the rights, all the titles and possessions that have grown up upon this United States grant.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will my colleague allow me one question?

Mr. DAVIS, of California. The gentleman will have plenty of time by and by, and he can avail himself of it.

During this period of twenty-two years this land has passed from hand to hand. It has been given away; it has been deeded; it has been sold to parties, who have purchased it in good faith, investing their earnings or savings upon their faith and trust in the patent of the United States. It has been bequeathed by dying men as the sole support of their widows and children. The homesteads that are scattered over this property are held in many cases as the sole supports of the occupants. The men who have settled there have improved this property; they have cleared the land; they have constructed roads and fences; they have built houses and barns, until to-day the value of the property is vastly greater than it was at the time of all this litigation. To-day the value of the property is fairly estimated at $2,000,000. Even if there had been any wrong in the beginning a much greater wrong would now be committed by setting aside all these vested rights. The statute of limitations of the State has run against those who would disturb these rights.

This bill proposes to set aside the State statute of limitations. Whatever may have been the opinion of the courts in former days in reference to the statute of limitations, it has certainly increased in favor during the last few years, and is regarded everywhere as a statute of repose. It is believed the rights of real property should be settled permanently and that adverse possession for a certain number of years should constitute indefeasible title. Under the bill it is proposed to set aside all those rights and allow these parties to supervene after a lapse of twenty-two years and upset vested rights.

Worse than all is the ultimate result, for if you pass this bill you disturb the title to more than one-half of the arable land in California. More than one-half of the arable land there is held under Spanish grants. They have all been passed through the courts and been adjudicated and their boundaries determined, and now by one stroke of the pen you are asked to initiate a course of proceeding that will shake to the foundation the title to real property on the Pacific coast. I ask you to beware. I ask you to reflect on the result of this action. I ask you to have respect for these men who relied on the patents of the United States, who have placed their faith and trust in the title derived from that great source. I ask you to consider the condition of the men who invested their property, of those who have mortgages on it, of those who have trusted all they have upon the faith of title derived from the United States, which you now are asked to set aside. I hope for the sake of the sanctity of property, for the sake of the rights of settlers, from considerations of conservatism and the need of repose in landed titles the House will refuse to pass the pending measure.

I now yield for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CANDLER.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, the report which was made from the Committee on Private Land Claims, drawn by myself, in the Forty-fourth Congress, distinctly states all of the material facts involved in this case. There is no fact in that report which is not sustained by record evidence. So far as I know, it is the only report ever presented to this House or to any committee of this House that gives all the material facts connected with the case.

This bill authorizes the correction of a disputed boundary between two tracts of land in the State of California. It is predicated, first, on the idea that great wrong has been done to the petitioners in this case by depriving them of land to which they had a grant. It is claimed that a wrong has been done in a survey and patent of a grant of land in California adjoining that in which these petitioners are interested, and they have had no opportunity to correct the wrong as against them in any court or other tribunal. That is the whole alleged equity in this case.

It is said in this report, and I repeat it here, that in every forum having jurisdiction, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, through all of the courts of the United States and in the courts of California, this question has been fairly met and everywhere adjudicated against these petitioners. They are two adjoining Mexican grants; they are grants described by natural boundaries. The grant of the survey and patent, of which complaint is made, was made in 1835. The grant to these petitioners was made in 1840. Both of these grants have been ascertained and settled by a commission provided for ascertaining and settling private land claims in the State of California. Both of these grants have been patented by the United States, and in both cases, according to the distances mentioned as descriptive of the lands granted, contain a much larger quantity of land than was granted, but according to the natural boundaries specified in the grants the right quantity. For instance, in the Los Pulgas grant, if the grant was for a certain number of leagues in length and a certain number of leagues in width, more than twice the number of acres have been granted than those distances would cover.

So in regard to the grant to Juan Coppinger. If either grant is to be fixed by distances then they have five thousand acres of land more than was granted to them. But the fact is, neither of these grants was for land described by distances. They were grants of land fixed by natural boundaries. The grant which was made in 1835 is a grant of land lying between the bay of San Francisco and the mountains, west, extending from a creek on the north called San Mateo to a creek on the south called San Francisquito, estimated to contain four leagues in latitude and one league in longitude. In fact the distance from these creeks, from San Mateo on the north to San Francisquito on the south, is more than five leagues. This body of land conveyed between the bay of San Francisco and the mountains is in some places three leagues in width, in the center one and four-tenths, and at one end one and eight-tenths, owing to the irregular line of the bay of San Francisco.

The grant to Juan Coppinger, made in 1840, is not a grant of land three-fourths of a league in width and two and a half leagues in length, but it is a grant of a valley called the Cañada de Raimando, estimated by the petitioner for the grant to be at the most three-fourths of a league in width and about two and a half leagues in length; but for both of those grants, and in the same way and in the mode provided for ascertaining these Mexican titles, there has been a survey and patent by the United States.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question right there. Does not the original grant of the Mexican government to the Arguellos, made at Monterey on the 27th November, 1835, grant to them the Los Pulgas tract; and is not that grant described as four leagues in latitude and one league in longitude?

Mr. CANDLER. No, sir.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Here is the law. If that is not correct, I agree to abandon the case at once.

Mr. CANDLER. Then you will abandon the case.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Here is the law, 18 Howard, 542, as quoted by the Supreme Court of the United States:

> The land herein mentioned is four leagues in latitude and one in longitude.

And here is the language in the decision of the Supreme Court, page 274, 21 Howard.

Their grant, as confirmed by this court, is bounded on the north by the arroyo of San Francisquito, on the south by that of San Mateo, on the east by the estuary, and on the west by the cañada or valley of Raimando, being four leagues in width and one in length.

Mr. CANDLER. I will quote the identical language of the grant itself. It is as follows:

> Whereas citizen José Estrada has petitioned, in the name of his minor wards, José Ramon and Luis, and the girls Maria Concepcion and Maria Josefa, legitimate children of the late citizen Luis Arguello, the tract known under the name of Los Pulgas, the boundaries of which are: On the south the creek of San Francisquito; on the north that of San Mateo; on the east the estuaries; and on the west the Cañada de Raimando.

The very tract of land conveyed to these petitioners they have had confirmed to them, for which a survey has been made and a patent issued; and in that patent and survey instead of getting a valley of about eight thousand acres of land they have a survey and patent covering more than twelve thousand acres of land.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman has evaded my question altogether.

Mr. GUNTER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CANDLER. I do not yield. I have but fifteen minutes. There were two grants presented by the claimants of the Los Pulgas grant; the grant of the valley of Cañada de Raimando and a grant to the land on the bay of San Francisco. The court rejected the claim for the lands in the valley and confirmed the other.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman has not read the portion embraced in the decision of the court. He has only read a portion of it.

Mr. CANDLER. I have read the entire description of the land conveyed. In a subsequent part of this grant are these words:

> I have concluded to declare to him the ownership of the same by the present letters, said concession being understood to be in entire conformity to what is ordered by law, reserving the approval of the most excellent territorial deputation. The tract of which mention is made is of four leagues of latitude and one of longitude.

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is exactly what I said was confirmed, and no more.

Mr. CANDLER. The words used in the grant are words not limiting the quantity of land conveyed, but are words descriptive of the lands conveyed. And this is the construction placed upon these words in this grant by the Supreme Court of the United States; for in the judgment affirming the judgment of confirmation of this grant, to the words describing the lands granted as so many leagues in latitude and so many in longitude, the qualifying words, "be the same more or less," are added. If they intended to say the claimants were only entitled to four leagues in latitude and one in longitude, then it was foolish to use the qualifying words "more or less," as they negative precisely what the court had confirmed as being within certain specified natural boundaries.

The other proposition is that these parties have had no opportunity anywhere to test the correctness of the survey and patent. I affirm that everywhere, before the United States land commissioner, before the United States district court in California, before the State courts of California, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, everywhere, before the departments and in the courts, the identical question made here has been presented and has been considered with the evidence and adjudicated adversely to these petitioners.

Under the act of 1851 there is a remedy provided for parties contesting the validity of any confirmation of a grant. Under the thirteenth section of that act parties who contest the correctness of a survey are authorized to petition the United States judge of the district in which the lands are situated for an injunction restraining the parties interested from applying for a patent until a decision of the contested title shall have been made or sufficient time for such decision shall have passed.

These parties sought the remedy there provided, and petitioned the United States judge of the district in which lies this land. The injunction was refused upon a petition making this identical question, that the survey was erroneous; that is, that the survey covered a greater number of acres of land than granted; that the survey extended to the Cañada de Raimando, whereas it ought to have been confined to one Spanish league in longitude, measuring west from the bay of San Francisco. With these alleged facts shown to the district judge the injunction was refused.

Afterward, these petitioners claiming and being in possession of a part of the land covered by the Los Pulgas patent, an action of ejectment was brought in the United States circuit court to recover the lands covered by the Los Pulgas patent and in the possession of these petitioners, Dennis Martin and others. In this action of ejectment, and in the Supreme Court, where the case was finally decided, there is an adjudication adverse to the claim as now made, it is said, because they were not allowed to prove their equitable right. The decision was that this Los Pulgas patent covered all the land in dispute, and that the Coppinger grant, under which these petitioners claim, did not cover them. These men had a patent for all the land, a grant of which was petitioned for by Juan Coppinger to the Mexican authorities.

They had a title to the land that had been granted to them, but not to the lands covered by the surveys of what is called the Los Pulgas grant, and they were not allowed to prove that there was anything erroneous in the survey, for the reason that they had no interest in it; and afterward, when the judgment of the ejectment suit against these petitioners was to be enforced, a bill before the circuit judge to enjoin the putting the plaintiffs into possession of the Los Pulgas grant was filed, and the identical complaint that we have here was the equity upon which this relief was asked. This bill was brought in pursuance of a suggestion made in the Supreme Court, in the opinion rendered and reversing the judgment of the circuit court in the ejectment suit, that the complainants might have a remedy in equity. They sought the equity jurisdiction of the court to correct this wrong that had been done them as the same of which complaint is here made. In that way the whole case and the facts were heard, and the judge of the circuit court refused to grant the injunction; and so by a court having rightful jurisdiction of the question was there a judgment adverse to the claim of petitioners.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Why did the court refuse it?

Mr. CANDLER. They refused it because the parties had no right to the land covered by the judgment. I have no time to read it, but I have the judgment here, and it is cited in the report of the Committee on Private Land Claims in the Forty-fourth Congress, to-day read. Again, a bill was filed in one of the district courts of California, under section 284 of the practice act of that State, against these parties for the purpose of determining their adverse claim and for quieting the possession, and to the plaintiffs, the Los Pulgas patentees. In answer to this bill the parties here and Dennis Martin and others admitted the possession of the Los Pulgas grantees, alleged the erroneous survey of the grant in covering all the land west of the line, one league from the bay of San Francisco. Upon this bill and answer, the facts involved by the pleadings having been agreed upon by the parties, a judgment was rendered by the court adverse to the complaint made in the answer of error in the survey of the Los Pulgas grant.

Mr. WIGGINTON. Why did the court do that?

Mr. CANDLER. They decided the case upon its merits. Upon an appeal by the defendants to the supreme court of the State of California this judgment was affirmed at the October term, 1864. This judgment was carried by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and was there pending until March, 1871, when it was dismissed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I yield to the gentleman all the further time he requires.

Mr. CANDLER. I have followed this complaint wherever it has been a matter of litigation in the courts, and whenever litigated it has been held without merit, thus in the courts constituted alone to determine disputes between citizens in more than ten years of litigation this complaint finding no favor. It is found first in the Forty-first Congress, in search of help from the Federal legislation, and is favored in the report by the distinguished gentleman from New York,

[Mr. MAYHAM,] in which it is adopted as the report of the Committee on Private Land Claims in this House. It is here presented for favorable action in a report showing an investigation so partially made that they do not know the member who introduced the bill, and refer to the report made by Mr. MAYHAM, of New York, to a Congress of which he was not a member.

The truth is that this is a bill the object of which is to afford another hearing of a case finally adjudicated in the State and Federal courts at the instance of parties who have become interested in the matters adjudicated pending this litigation. There can be by this proposed legislation no good to anybody, not even to these parties, unless some illegitimate good is to be had to them by threatening those who have had possession of these lands for over twenty years with suits such as they have been compelled to prosecute or defend in all the courts from 1853 to 1871.

It has been well said that the titles to more than seventeen thousand acres of land within twenty miles of the city of San Francisco, now owned by hundreds of persons, worth millions of dollars, are to be put in a state of uncertainty. The rights of the parties are to be questioned who became purchasers of these lands, long after final judgments were rendered by the courts in denial of the complaints of the petitioners for relief to this Congress. There never was more objectionable legislation than that proposed in this bill. It is legislation in favor of particular parties. It is legislation in favor of men who have acquired an interest either pending or subsequent to the adjudication of all these questions in the courts. It is an appeal to the legislative power of the Government for help after the courts have decided that the complainants have no rights in the premises to be vindicated. It is an effort again to put in question the title to a large and very valuable body of land by parties who can have no legal claim to or interest in the lands and whose equitable claim has been adversely determined by competent authority of their choice.

The original grant to Juan Coppinger only covered a small valley known as Cañada de Raimando. They have all that valley, and between this valley and another valley lying east of it there is a great hill country in which there are more than seventeen thousand acres of land covered by the grant to the Arguello children, part of the Los Pulgas grant, to which they have no claim legal or equitable.

Sir, the legislation proposed is wrong—wrong in principle, wrong upon the facts, and wrong because the question has been adjudicated finally more than ten years ago in favor of the parties now in possession of the lands.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would inquire if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calender.

Mr. PAGE. Is the amendment of my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] pending?

The SPEAKER. It is, and he has eight minutes of his hour remaining.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now call for the regular order.

The motion of Mr. BRIGHT was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BELL in the chair.

JOHN ADAMS AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4143) for the relief of John Adams, William B. Clift, David Dunseath, William Killinger, J. F. Scott, administrator of the estate of Obediah Scott, deceased, Davis C. Peak, Charles Linderman, James Linnane, Patrick Carey, John McMahon, and James Gorman, administrator of the estate of Patrick Gorman, deceased; reported by Mr. OLIVER from the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following persons the following sums, in full for services in the United States naval service during the late war:

To John Adams, for services as mate, the sum of $810.

To William B. Clift, for services as pilot, the sum of $4,050.

To David Dunseath, for services as pilot, the sum of $4,050.

To William Killinger, for services as watchman, the sum of $675.

To J. F. Scott, administrator of the estate of Obediah Scott, for services as engineer, the sum of $2,075.

To Davis C. Peak, for services as engineer, the sum of $1,012.50.

To John McMahon, for services as deck-hand, the sum of $607.50.

To James Gorman, administrator of the estate of Patrick Gorman, deceased, for services as deck-hand, the sum of $607.50.

Mr. ELLSWORTH called for the reading of the report; which was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3353) for the relief of John Adams, William B. Clift, David Dunseath, William Killinger, Obediah Scott, David Peak, Charles Linderman, James Linnane, Patrick

Carey, John McMahon, and James Gorman, administrator of the estate of Patrick Gorman, deceased; the bill (H. R. No. 3087) for the relief of John Adams, of Franklin County, Indiana; the bill (H. R. No. 2589) for the relief of Davis C. Peak, of Kenton County, Kentucky; the bill (H. R. No. 2590) for the relief of William B. Clift, of Campbell County, Kentucky; the bill (H. R. No. 2591) for the relief of David Dunseath, of Campbell County, Kentucky; the bill (H. R. No. 2592) for the relief of Obediah Scott, of Kenton County, Kentucky; the bill (H. R. No. 2593) for the relief of William Killinger, of Campbell County, Kentucky, report:

That said John Adams was mate and said William B. Clift was pilot on the steamboat Champion No. 3; and that said David Dunseath was pilot; said Obediah Scott, first engineer; said Davis C. Peak, second engineer; said William Killinger, watchman; said Charles Linderman, cook and steward; and said James Linnane, Patrick Carey, John McMahon, and Patrick Gorman were deck-hands on the steamboat Champion No. 5; that said Obediah Scott is now deceased, and J. F. Scott is administrator of his estate; and said Patrick Gorman is deceased, and James Gorman is administrator of his estate.

The facts in these cases are in all material respects the same as in the case of John C. Ray, H. R. 1855. The vessels Champion No. 3 and Champion No. 5 were engaged in company in the same service and were impressed under the same order, at the same time, and for the same expedition, and proceeded thereon under the same command, and were destroyed while attempting to run the same battery one on the 26th of April, 1864, and the other the day following. The claims are for payment of wages during the same captivity, and were presented in the same manner for payment, and rejected for the same reasons. In that case, your committee reported as follows:

"In April, 1864, said Ray was employed, at a salary of $400 per month, as pilot of the steamboat Champion No. 3, then employed in towing barges of coal for the Army and Navy of the Lower Mississippi. When the boat reached the mouth of Red River, about the 15th of April, she was ordered and compelled, against the protest of her officers and crew, to proceed up that river to Alexandria, about one hundred and twenty miles, and report to Commodore D. D. Porter with one barge of coal, and when she did so, she was then required and compelled, against the protest of officers and crew, to proceed about one hundred and twenty miles farther up the river to assist in raising the sunken United States vessel Eastport.

"Commodore Porter accompanied the expedition in his flag-boat and commanded it. On the return, they came to a confederate battery of nineteen guns, meantime erected near the mouth of Cain Creek, and in running the same, under the orders of Commodore Porter, the boiler of the Champion No. 3 was exploded by a shot, and only seven persons out of one hundred and seventy on board escaped with their lives. The Champion No. 5 was also totally destroyed, and the survivors of both crews made prisoners of war, and confined at Camp Ford, Texas, where they suffered privations and exposures scarcely paralleled in the history of the war. The claimant asks to be paid his wages during the time he was a prisoner.

"This claim was presented to the accounting officers of the Navy for payment, and rejected for want of authority to allow it, as it appears by the following extract from a letter of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, in reply to a request on behalf of your committee for information:

"'I entered upon the examination with reluctance, for I had already become impressed that the claimant, as a survivor of the terrible disaster referred to and the dangers of the long and irksome incarceration, deserved substantial recognition at the hands of the Government, and I know of no law that authorized the adjustment of his claim by the accounting officers of the Treasury. After examination of the case it was with regret that I came to the conclusion that this case is casus omissus.

"'Congress has directly provided (Revised Statutes, section 3483) that one who sustains damage by the destruction by an enemy of a vessel, while such property is in the military service, shall be paid the value of the vessel. And section 4693, Revised Statutes, has been construed to authorize the payment of a pension in a case where the terms of employment were the same as that under which claimant was engaged at the time of the disaster. I have examined carefully the regulations of the Army and of the Navy and the acts of Congress, together with the authorities cited by the claimant's attorney, and I am unable to find any like provision that would authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to sustain this claim without further legislation.

"'I am, very respectfully,

"'W. W. UPTON,
"'Second Comptroller.'

"Your committee fully concur with the Second Comptroller as to the justice and merit of this claim.

"Under the laws above referred to the owner of the vessel has been paid its value and the widows of the killed have been pensioned. No good reason exists why the survivors should not be paid wages during the time of their captivity. If their comrades who lost their lives were in the service of the United States so as to entitle their widows to pension, surely the survivors were in the service and entitled to pay. If the owner of the vessel, who risked his property in the service of the United States, was entitled to compensation for its loss, then a fortiori (as life and liberty are dearer than property) he who risked his life and lost his liberty in the service of the United States should at least have pay for the time lost in captivity. And such is the ruling and practice in auditing accounts for services in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army in precisely similar cases, as appears by the following letter received by your committee in reply to an inquiry addressed to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, who has charge of that duty in Army accounts:

"'TREASURY DEPARTMENT, THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
"'Washington, D. C., January 24, 1878.

"'In response to your letter of the 22d instant, asking as to the practice of this office in reference to claims filed by employés of the Quartermaster's Department for compensation as such employés while held as prisoners of war, you are informed that it has not been the custom of this office to make any allowance to such persons merely as damages for detention while in captivity. The action of the office has been founded on the theory that persons hired by the Quartermaster's Department and carried on the rolls of that Department continue to be the servants thereof during captivity, and are entitled to be paid at the rate of hiring until discharged from the service.

* * * * * * *

"'The favorable action of this office has not, however, been confined to persons in the service of the Quartermaster's Department under express contract, but has been extended to the crews of boats which have been impressed into the military service, which crews have been subsequently captured, upon the theory that by the impressment of the boat the Government make the employés of the owners its servants.

"'There is no special statute authorizing these allowances, but the act of 1817 (section 277, Revised Statutes) imposing upon the Third Auditor the duty of examining all accounts of the Quartermaster's Department, has been deemed to confer ample authority for the action taken.

"'In reference to compensation the rule has been to continue to an employé the pay he was receiving from his employer at the time of the capture and to continue the same while he is actually held as a prisoner of war—that is to say, up to the time of his parole—allowing, in addition, a reasonable time for his return to the port of shipment.

"'I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"'HORACE AUSTIN, Auditor.'"

It would thus seem that in precisely similar cases pay is allowed in the Army and disallowed in the Navy. Your committee do not question the correctness of the ruling in either case. It is probably casus omissus in the case of the Navy, as the Second Comptroller suggests; but it is evident that the Government should be prompt to mete out the same justice to the gallant men who do the same services in the time of danger, whether done in the Army or the Navy. Whether an act be performed under the orders of a general or a commodore can make no possible difference either in its merit or its worth.

These men were all captured on the 26th and 27th days of April, 1864, and were exchanged on the 27th day of May, 1865, and reached Cincinnati on their return on the 11th day of June, 1865. Although the wages for like service on Red River were much greater than they were receiving for services on the Mississippi, yet your committee feel bound by the rule of the Department as above stated, and recommend the payment of the same wages they were receiving when impressed from the time of their capture up to the time of their return to Cincinnati, and report the following substitute for all of said bills and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I came in just as the last bill was laid aside. I intended to object, and will do so now if it is not too late.

Mr. OLIVER. I insist that the gentleman is too late.

Mr. DURHAM. If I am not too late I object, because a bill reported a little while ago, proposing to pay a claim as just as any other man's, the claimant being from my own town, was objected to.

Mr. OLIVER. I must insist that the objection comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the objection comes too late.

WILLIAM FALLS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4144) for the relief of William Falls, of Alexandria County, Virginia; reported by Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, from the Committee on War Claims.

Objected to by Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania.

PAYMENT OF INTERNAL-REVENUE OFFICERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 105) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain officers of the internal-revenue service the amounts due them for their services as such officers previous to the time of executing their bonds and taking the oath of office as prescribed by law; reported by Mr. BURCHARD, from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that in the cases of John C. Cartwright, of the collection district of Oregon; Clark Waggoner, of the tenth collection district of Ohio; Ellery M. Brayton, of the collection district of South Carolina; W. H. Wheeler, of the fifth collection district of North Carolina; William M. Woodcock, of the fifth collection district of Tennessee; Otis H. Russell, of the third collection district of Virginia; and Burt Van Horn, of the twenty-eighth collection district of New York, who were respectively appointed collectors of internal revenue for the districts mentioned during the recess of the Senate, which existed until the 15th day of October, 1877, and duly entered upon the discharge of the duties of such appointment, and were during the session of the Senate which begun on the last-mentioned date nominated and, upon confirmation by the Senate, appointed and commissioned as collectors for their respective districts, and continued in the discharge of their official duties, without having delivered the official bonds or taken the oaths prescribed by law, under the last-mentioned appointment, until subsequent to the adjournment of said session of the Senate, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay such collectors the compensation and expenses belonging to their respective offices, and which would, according to law, have accrued to them had they, before entering upon the discharge of their duties under their last appointment or before the expiration of the said session of the Senate, given the bonds and taken the oaths prescribed by law, provided that bonds shall have been given and such oaths taken prior to the passage of this resolution.

An amendment reported by the Committee of Ways and Means was read and agreed to, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

And all acts of such persons as collectors of internal revenue during such times as they severally performed the duties of said office, after the close of said session of the Senate and before they were duly qualified under their regular appointment, shall be held to be as valid as if they had duly qualified as collectors before entering upon the performance of such duties.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SAMUEL B. STAUBER AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1326) for the relief of Samuel B. Stauber and others; reported by Mr. ROBBINS from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill was read. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury to refund and repay to Samuel B. Stauber, J. J. Petree, and William Shouse, to each of them, $262.50, which sum each of said parties has been required to pay and has paid into the Treasury of the United States as special tax upon brandy, although they were released and discharged from the payment thereof by chapter 48 of the private acts of the Forty-fourth Congress.

The following amendment reported by the committee was agreed to:

In line 5, before the words "William Shouse," insert the words "Adaline M. Shouse, widow of."

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM C. EDMONSTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1346) for the relief of William C. Edmonston; reported by Mr. ELLSWORTH from the Committee of Claims.

Objected to by Mr. BRAGG.

ESTATE OF HENRY K. SANGER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4240) for the relief of the estate of Henry K. Sanger, late United States depositary at Detroit, Michigan, and for other purposes; reported by Mr. ELLSWORTH from the Committee of Claims.

Objected to by Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky.

N. BOYDEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 685) for the relief of N. Boyden; reported by Mr. ELLSWORTH from the Committee of Claims.

Objected to by Mr. BRAGG.

D. G. AND D. A. SANFORD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4241) for the relief of D. G. and D. A. Sanford; reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by Mr. MORGAN.

Objected to by Mr. SPARKS.

EASTERN BAND OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 228) to authorize and enable the eastern band of Cherokee Indians to institute and prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims against the Cherokee Nation; reported by Mr. MORGAN from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Objected to by Mr. CONGER and others.

S. T. MARSHALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1614) for the relief of S. T. Marshall, of Lee County, Iowa; reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by Mr. BOONE.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to S. T. Marshall, of Lee County, Iowa, whatever sum may be found to be due him on account of beef-cattle furnished the United States for the use of the Indian Department in California in 1851, upon a fair and equitable settlement of his accounts, as assignee of G. M. Marshall, with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. EDEN called for the reading of the report; which was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1614) for the relief of S. T. Marshall, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This claim was considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and submitted their report thereon, which is as follows:

"Mr. BOONE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. No. 2695:

"The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 118) for the relief of S. T. Marshall, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

"As the purchasing and disbursing agent of the commission which was sent to California in 1850 to make treaties with the hostile Indians in California, Reddick McKee made a contract with General Estill to furnish beef-cattle for the escort of United States soldiers which accompanied said McKee and party; that said Estill did furnish a large number of cattle under the contract, in which the claimant seems to have been interested. In December, 1850, at San Francisco, the accounts of Estill and Marshall were settled, and the agent McKee gave to them a certificate of indebtedness showing that there was due them on the beef contract the sum of $6,598.49, which said McKee said, and still says, he had not the money to pay, in consequence of the appropriation for the service in California having been reduced much below what he supposed it would be. As evidence of said indebtedness, however, said McKee gave to G. M. Marshall a certificate of indebtedness. A copy, as sworn to by said McKee, is herewith submitted, together with the other evidence in the case. And, confirmatory of this, said McKee, in his official report to the Committee on Indian Affairs, states that this amount is due to said Marshall, but qualified by an indorsement in these words, 'Subject to credit.' But your committee have not been able to ascertain the amount of the 'credit' to which said claim is 'subject,' nor on what account. Your committee are satisfied, however, that a part at least of this claim is just, and ought to be paid.

"It may be, and your committee believe it is, true that the contract made by said McKee with Estill and Marshall to furnish beef to the expedition was made without authority of law; but the evidence shows very clearly that said McKee was the accredited agent of the Government, and that these parties contracted with him under the belief that he had authority to contract with them for and on behalf of the Government, and that he himself believed he had authority to make the contract with them; and also that these parties, in good faith, furnished the beef-cattle for the use of the Government, and that the Government got the benefit of them. It seems but just and equitable, therefore, that these parties should be paid a fair compensation for their property so furnished the Government. Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, as a substitute for House bill No. 118, referred to them."

Your committee have again considered the claim, and fully concur in the foregoing report, and hereby adopt the same, and recommend the passage of said bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM G. HALPINE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1015) for the relief of William G. Halpine for losses sustained while serving in the United States Army in 1862 and 1863; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. BRAGG.

Mr. CONGER. I think this bill had better be discussed a little. I object to its passage now.

JAMES D. WOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3958) for the relief of James D. Wood, late captain and assistant adjutant-general; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. BRAGG.

Objected to by Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky.

CEMETERY LOT, MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3434) releasing the title to a certain cemetery lot to the city of Montgomery, Alabama; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey.

The bill was read. It recites that by deed dated July 14, 1866, the city of Montgomery, Alabama, voluntarily granted to the United States a certain lot of land in the cemetery of that city, to be used for the burial of United States soldiers, and for no other purpose; that the United States, having removed the bodies of soldiers buried therein to Atlanta, have no longer need of the same; and that the lot is now needed by the city of Montgomery, Alabama, for burial purposes. The bill therefore provides that all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to said cemetery lot is hereby released and forever quitclaimed to the said city of Montgomery.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN J. MANUEL AND CHILDREN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) providing for transportation by the military authorities of John J. Manuel and two infant daughters from Camp Howard, Idaho Territory, to Saint Charles, Missouri; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey.

The bill was read.

The preamble states that John J. Manuel, of White Bird, Idaho County, Idaho Territory, was twice wounded and permanently disabled by the Nez Percé Indians, on the 14th day of June, 1877, and his wife and infant child killed about the same time, and an infant daughter of seven years twice wounded, and his property almost wholly burned and destroyed, leaving him and his infant daughters, Maggie and Julia, aged respectively seven and ten years, without means of support, and that the mother of John J. Manuel resides at Flint Hill, Saint Charles County, Missouri, and he is desirous of being removed to Flint Hill, that himself and daughters may have the care and attention of his mother.

The bill then empowers and directs the Secretary of War to furnish military transportation to said John J. Manuel and his two daughters from Camp Howard, Idaho Territory, to Saint Charles, in the State of Missouri, and appropriates $200, or so much thereof as may be required for that purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. ALVAH A. CLARK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

Your committee beg leave to submit the substitute herewith in place of the original resolution, and recommend that the same do pass.

The matters set forth in the resolution are supported by sufficient proof to recommend this action.

This man, John J. Manuel, was a settler on the frontier. His life was not only jeopardized, but he was wounded so that he will never recover; his property destroyed and taken from him; his wife ravished and killed, and children, one murdered, the others maimed; and in that condition he asks that he, with his two children remaining, may be carried by the Government back to his mother, to die. Humanity speaks loudly in his behalf, and the government that cannot render aid under such circumstances is not the government to encourage emigration to settle our lands on the frontiers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS BLAIR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4005) for the relief of Thomas Blair, Fifteenth United States Infantry; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. MCCOOK.

Objected to by Mr. EDEN.

PRIVATE WILLIAM HINES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4007) for the relief of Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth United States Infantry, who lost his trousers and blanket by fire at Aiken, South Carolina; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. MCCOOK.

The preamble of the bill states that Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth United States Infantry, on or about the 11th day of October, 1876, at Aiken, South Carolina, did lose his trousers and blanket by fire; that a gratuitous issue was suggested by a board of survey, and afterward made to said Hines, which issue appears to have been unauthorized by law or regulation; and that said Hines, relying upon said suggestion, did accept and wear said trousers and use said blanket, contrary to the statute, and in consequence the money value of said articles has been charged to him.

The bill then authorizes the Secretary of War to credit Private William Hines, of Company F, Eighteenth United States Infantry, with the sum of $8.65, being the money value of the trousers and blanket issued to him in consequence of loss by fire, and which amount has been charged against him.

Mr. BRAGG. Let the report be read.

Mr. McCOOK. The report is quite lengthy, and I do not see the necessity for taking the time of the House in reading it.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, there is; let it be read.

The report was read as follows, and it was frequently interrupted with laughter and applause:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4007) for the relief of Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth United States Infantry, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

The evidence is conclusive that Hines was a member of the company and regiment referred to, and that he lost his trousers and blanket by fire on or about the 11th day of October, A. D. 1876, while serving with his command at Aiken, South Carolina.

The time, place, and circumstances under which this loss occurred deserve much more than a mere passing notice. It was the year of the presidential election, and but one brief month prior to the time when the freemen of the Republic were called upon to cast their ballots for the men, or rather the electors of their choice. The air was filled with the eloquence of orators both North and South, who spoke and labored for the success of their candidates. The propriety, not to say the constitutionality, of the presence of Federal troops in the southern section of our beloved country was a question that entered largely into the discussion of the day. Upon this subject there was then as now great difference of opinion; and without committing themselves upon this disputed point your committee find unanimously that Hines was there by order of the legally-constituted authorities; that he wore the usual and ordinary uniform of the private soldier; that he lost his trousers and blanket as set forth in the bill for his relief; that the loss occurred by fire; that a board of survey was called upon them, and that, in the language of that tribunal, "they were damaged to their full value," amounting to $8.65.

Your committee also find that this same board expressed the opinion that the fire was accidental; "that it originated at the top of the tent," and "that no one was to blame." There is no direct testimony upon this point, but it is fair to assume that Hines was lying down in his tent enjoying needed repose after a day's labor in asserting and maintaining the sovereignty of the General Government. It is true that those who seek to hold him responsible refer to the general and careless use of the pipe by our weary warriors; and others have attempted to account for the catastrophe by calling attention to the dangerous habit of soldiers carrying matches in their trousers' pockets. Both of these theories, although plausible, are rejected by your committee; and after patient investigation they are of the opinion that the fire originated in some unaccountable manner. If, as is altogether probable, Hines was recumbent in his tent, the conclusion is almost irresistible that he had disrobed and placed his blouse and trousers on the convenient and useful cracker-box; the progress of the flames from the top of the tent, where they originated, to his soldierly couch, doubtless aroused him from his reverie or sleep; and while the evidence is not entirely satisfactory on this point, your committee are of the opinion that Hines in his zeal to fight the fire and save Government property lost both trousers and blanket.

With this view of the case your committee accept the finding of the board of survey and discharge him from responsibility. No specific recommendations appear in their report, but through some misapprehension a gratuitous issue of trousers and blanket was made to him. As events proved, this was a fatal mistake. His commanding officer, misconstruing a mere suggestion, and perhaps unwilling that Hines should appear before the people of Aiken trouserless, or, concluding that the honor and dignity of the United States would be put in jeopardy by his appearing on duty in a pair "damaged to their full value," made proper haste to rehabilitate him.

From this time Hines vanishes from the scene. How he disported himself in his new trousers nowhere appears. Unconsciously he had performed a great service to the Army and the country by causing an authoritative decision on a matter that had been involved in doubt. The question of a gratuitous issue of clothing is now settled, and while Hines may be indifferent to the trouble he has given captains, colonels, major-generals, a Secretary of War, and a congressional committee, he can content himself with the reflection that he has neither worn nor lost his trousers in vain.

In conclusion, your committee desire to call attention to the fact that they have devoted much time and thought to this case. The papers are voluminous, containing no less than seven distinct indorsements, commencing with a captain and concluding with the Secretary of War, who, in a communication to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, asks for the relief of Hines; or, to use his own well-chosen words, "requests the sanction of Congress for the issuing of said clothing to said Hines."

This communication is marked "A" and made a part of this report.

It is in no vainglorious spirit that your committee state that whatever delay there has been in this matter the blame does not attach to them.

The trouble with Hines began nearly eighteen months since, and the papers only reached the hands of your committee a few days ago; and in placing the final determination of the question with the Representatives of the people, they feel that they are discharged from further responsibility. They cannot, however, dismiss the subject without calling attention to the almost perfect system of checks and guards thrown around the issuing of Government property. The thoughtless may call it "red-tape," or circumlocution, but without it, Hines to-day would be in undisputed possession of a pair of trousers and a blanket to which he would have no legal title. As it is, the system has been vindicated, the right of the United States to Hines's trousers fully established, and his personal and pecuniary responsibility determined.

Under all the circumstances, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 25, 1878.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of papers in relation to a gratuitous issue of clothing made on the authority of the department commander to Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, to replace certain articles lost by the burning of his tent at Aiken, South Carolina, and respectfully to request the sanction of Congress for the issue of said clothing.

GEO. W. McCRARY,
Secretary of War.

To the SPEAKER
Of the House of Representatives.

MCPHERSON BARRACKS,
Atlanta, Georgia, August 11, 1877.

SIR: I have the honor to state that Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, suffered a loss of one pair of trousers and one woolen blanket by the burning of his tent in Aiken, South Carolina. A gratuitous issue was made to him of these articles on the authority of the department commander on the recommendation of a board of survey. This issue was disallowed by the Quartermaster-General for want of the approval of the Secretary of War. These articles have accordingly been charged against him on his clothing account.

I would respectfully ask authority of the honorable Secretary of War to credit him with the money value of the same.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. J. LLOYD,
Captain Eighteenth Infantry, Commanding Company F.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL, U. S. A.,
Washington, D. C.

[First indorsement.]

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, August 14, 1877.

Respectfully returned to the commanding officer Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, McPherson Barracks, Atlanta, Georgia, (through headquarters Department of the South,) inviting attention to paragraph 451, Revised Army Regulations of 1863.

There is no authority for a gratuitous issue of clothing, except as provided in General Orders No. 98 of 1867 and No. 23 of 1868 from this office.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

[Second indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE SOUTH,
Atlanta, Georgia, August 17, 1877.

Respectfully transmitted to commanding officer Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, through commanding officer McPherson Barracks, Atlanta, Georgia.

The records at these headquarters do not show that the department commander authorized any gratuitous issue of clothing to Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, on the recommendation of a board of survey. The board of survey in question made no recommendations whatever, but simply found the facts of the case, and that no blame should be attached to any one.

By command of Colonel Ruger, brevet brigadier-general, United States Army.

C. McKEEVER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

[Third indorsement.]

POST OF MCPHERSON BARRACKS,
Atlanta, Georgia, August 18, 1877.

Respectfully referred to the commanding officer Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, with reference to the second indorsement. This paper to be returned with remark.

By order of Captain T. J. Lloyd.

C. P. PAUL,
First Lieutenant Eighteenth Infantry, Post-Adjutant.

[Fourth indorsement.]

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, August 21, 1877.

Respectfully returned, with the explanation that the request to make a gratuitous issue was made in the letter of transmittal of the proceedings of the board of survey. It was my impression that it had been made in an indorsement approving and forwarding the proceedings, in which case it would have been a part of the proceedings, and the letter of October 13, 1876, from headquarters Department of the South, approving the proceedings of the board, was, by this misapprehension taken as authorizing the gratuitous issue. General Order No. 23, of 1869, has no reference to the issue of clothing. I would respectfully request that these papers be forwarded to the honorable Secretary of War, with a view to having the case brought to the attention of the proper committee of Congress, in order that Private Hines, Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, may be reimbursed for the loss of one pair trousers and one woolen blanket, total money value $8.65. Copy of proceedings of board of survey and letter approving same are forwarded herewith.

THOS. J. LLOYD,
Captain Eighteenth Infantry, Commanding Company F.

[Fifth indorsement.]

POST OF MCPHERSON BARRACKS,
Atlanta, Georgia, August 21, 1877.

Respectfully forwarded, and attention invited to fourth indorsement.

THOS. J. LLOYD,
Captain Eighteenth Infantry, Commanding Post.

[Sixth indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE SOUTH,
Atlanta, Georgia, August 22, 1877.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant-General of the Army, through headquarters Division of the Atlantic, and attention requested to the fourth indorsement with reference to the suggestion that Congress be solicited to pass an act authorizing the issue of clothing. The statement made by Captain Lloyd in letter of August 4, that the issue of clothing referred to in that letter was made on the authority of the department commander, on the recommendation of a board of survey, was incorrect. No such authority was granted by the department commander. His explanation of the misapprehension is contained in the fourth indorsement.

THOS. H. RUGER,
Colonel Eighteenth Infantry,
Brevet Brigadier-General, U. S. A., Commanding.

[Seventh indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE ATLANTIC,
New York, August 24, 1877.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant-General of the Army, asking attention to the indorsements of Captain Lloyd, Eighteenth Infantry, and the commanding general of the South thereon (fifth and sixth.)

WINF'D S. HANCOCK,
Major-General, Commanding.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
February 8, 1878.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War, inviting attention to the indorsement of Captain Lloyd, Eighteenth Infantry, of August 21, 1877, hereon.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

[Copy of inclosure No. 1 to fourth indorsement.]

Proceedings of a board of survey convened at Abbeville, South Carolina, by virtue of the following order.

ABBEVILLE, SOUTH CAROLINA, October 11, 1876.

[ORDERS No. 3.]

A board of survey is hereby ordered to convene at this camp at ten o'clock a. m. to-day, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to report upon and fix the responsibility for the loss by fire of one common tent, the property of the United States, and one woolen blanket and one pair of trousers, the property of Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth Infantry.

Detail for the board.—First Lieutenant C. R. Paul, Eighteenth Infantry; Second Lieutenant F. H. Barnhart, Eighteenth Infantry.

T. J. LLOYD,
Captain Eighteenth Infantry, Commanding Detachment.

ABBEVILLE, SOUTH CAROLINA, October 11, 1876.

The board met pursuant to the above order.

Present: All the members.

The board then proceeded to examine into the condition of one common tent, the property of the United States, and for which Captain T. J. Lloyd, Eighteenth Infantry, is responsible; also one woolen blanket and one pair of trousers, the property of Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth Infantry, and find the condition of said articles to be as stated below.

One common tent, damaged beyond repair; one woolen blanket, damaged its full value, $4.55; one pair of trousers, damaged to their full value, $4.10.

The board find the damages aforesaid were caused by the tent taking fire; the board, however, after careful inquiry are unable to obtain any data as to the origin of the fire, but it is believed by the board that as the fire began at the top of the tent, near the ridge-pole, and in the day-time, that it was accidental. The board, therefore, is of the opinion that no blame should be attached to any person for the damage stated. There being no further business before the board, it adjourned sine die.

First Lieutenant Eighteenth Infantry, President.

FRANK H. BARNHART,
Second Lieutenant Eighteenth Infantry, Recorder.

Approved.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. McCOOK. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his objection. He objected once before, and this certainly cannot be considered one of the war claims in relation to which he is so sensitive.

Mr. BRAGG. I would be happy to withdraw my objection, but I cannot consent to allow the bill to pass because it is a little ludicrous.

Mr. CONGER. One objection will not suffice to prevent the passage of this bill. It was objected to once before on one of the hottest days of last June, when members of the House were indifferent to blankets or trousers. [Laughter.] It now requires five objections.

Mr. EDEN. I think it had better go over until we can have an opportunity to hear the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin discuss it. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCOOK. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. COX, of New York. This report ought to appear in the RECORD whether the bill is objected to or not.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. The bill was objected to once before, and this being the second time it is called it now requires under the rules five objections.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so.

Not more than one member objecting, and the rules requiring five objections, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH R. PRATT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1173) for the relief of Joseph R. Pratt; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. STRAIT.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Joseph R. Pratt, late first lieutenant of Company L, Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry, $400, being the value of two horses lost by him in the service of the United States during the late rebellion.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1173) for the relief of Joseph R. Pratt, have had the same under consideration, and report it back to the House with amendment. Strike out the words in fifth line, to wit, "four hundred dollars," and insert in lieu thereof "two hundred dollars;" and, as amended, they recommend that it do pass.

The affidavits in this case show that Joseph R. Pratt, late first lieutenant of Company L, Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry, was a commissioned officer of said regiment, and that he was mounted on a private horse belonging to himself, and for which it appears he had paid $360; that on or about the 5th day of August, 1864, he was stationed at Fort Smith, Arkansas; that his command was attacked on said day by confederate troops, and that during said engagement the horse of said Pratt, upon which he was mounted, was killed; and that, in the opinion of your committee, the horse was well worth the sum of $200, for which sum the said Pratt should receive compensation.

Your committee, in conclusion, find all the foregoing facts are fully substantiated by a mass of evidence from credible persons, and there can be no just reason why the said Pratt should not be paid the sum recommended.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out $400 and insert in lieu thereof $200.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM S. HANSELL & SONS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4290) for the relief of William L. Hansell & Sons; reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. STRAIT.

The bill, which was read, appropriates the sum of $901.57, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to repay to William S. Hansell & Sons, of Philadelphia, the amount of a certain judgment recovered against them by O. E. Woods, in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the suit defended by the Government; the said judgment being for a royalty agreed to be paid by the Government on certain knapsacks furnished by said William S. Hansell & Sons, the terms of their accepted bid having been omitted from the written contract.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The petition of William S. Hansell & Sons, of Philadelphia, for payment of about $900 royalty, which they were compelled by suit to pay on knapsacks of a certain pattern ordered by and furnished to the Quartermaster-General's Department, has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By the report of the Third Auditor it appears that the bid of Hansell & Sons, which contained the proviso that "should there be a royalty the United States to pay it," was accepted by the Government.

The United States defended the suit against Hansell & Sons for this royalty, which they paid after a decision on appeal by the Supreme Court of the United States, the War Department having advised the Attorney-General and Treasury that "good faith" required the Government to reimburse Hansell & Sons.

As it was not certain when the contract was made that any royalty whatever was due, the assistant quartermaster-general at Philadelphia left the proviso that the Government should pay the royalty out of the written contract, assuring Hansell & Sons that the Quartermaster-General's letter, shown to them, and the agreement made would protect them. The accounting officers of the Treasury, asserting that the money should be repaid to Hansell & Sons, express a doubt whether they can do this act of justice because the written contract omitted the proviso for payment of the royalty, and the Third-Auditor in his report urges that Congress shall be sought for the remedy.

The bid of Hansell & Sons, and its acceptance by the Government, are written documents contemporaneous with and part of the contract, which it appears so far from being varied by the United States have been constantly asserted by it as binding on them, and the omission to insert the proviso in what is called the contract appears to have been a mistake of a subordinate officer and not in accordance with his written instructions.

By sections 3744 and 3745, Revised Statutes, the Secretary of War must file in the Interior Department not only the contract paper, but all bids and proposals, and the officer making the contract shall swear "that the papers accompanying include all those relating to the said contract."

The committee believe that these clauses were enacted mainly for the purpose of ascertaining the contract in case of dispute, and believing also that the bid and its acceptance in the present case are part of the written papers to be considered in determining what the contract was, they adopt the suggestion of the Third Auditor, concurred in by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JAMES MONROE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3852) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late James Monroe, lieutenant-colonel Virginia State Line, war of the Revolution, and President of the United States; reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. MACKEY.

Objected to by Mr. BREWER.

ABIGAIL S. TILTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No.

1870) granting a pension to Abigail S. Tilton, reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions by Mr. MACKEY.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I object

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. This bill has been objected to before, and five objections are now required.

Mr. EDEN. It was attempted to get it up by unanimous consent when objection was then made.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. My recollection is that it was objected to in a night session when we were considering bills as of objection day. This is the relict of an old revolutionary soldier——

Mr. CONGER. It requires five objections under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The record fails to show that any objection has been made hitherto to this bill. Does the gentleman from New York still insist on his objection?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I do.

Mr. CONGER. My recollection is distinct that this bill was objected to before, and now under the rules it requires five objections to prevent its being reported with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. My recollection is precisely the same as that of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I object to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the bill is passed over for the present.

MARY J. SEARS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was an adverse report made by Mr. MACKEY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, on the petition of Mary J. Sears, praying for a pension.

The petition was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie upon the table.

FRANKLIN PAINE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1641) granting a pension to Franklin Paine.

Objected to by Mr. BRAGG.

GENERAL JAMES SHIELDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4369) granting an increase of pension to General James Shields.

Objected to by Mr. BREWER.

MARTIN RAFF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 707) granting a pension to Martin Raff; reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Mr. RIDDLE.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. That is an adverse report; let it be reported to be laid upon the table.

Mr. PRICE. I have received a letter——

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate.

Mr. PRICE. I am satisfied if the House will hear this letter read they will not find it to be debate.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

ALBEMARLE AND CHESAPEAKE CANAL COMPANY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 18) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company.

Objected to by Mr. ELLSWORTH.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was adverse reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs, by Mr. WILLIS, of New York, on the petition of H. H. Doty and on the petition of Mrs. C. A. Von Cort; which were laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that they be laid on the table.

JOHN D. M'GILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4418) for the relief of John D. McGill.

The bill, which was read, appropriates the sum of $102, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay John D. McGill for advertising the sale of the property known as the Philadelphia navy-yard in the Georgetown Courier, in November, 1875.

Mr. EDEN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. HARMER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report:

By act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, a commission was created to make sale and conveyance of the property known as the Philadelphia navy-yard. Authority was given to advertise the sale, and of the newspapers selected for that purpose the Georgetown Courier was included. The expenses of the commission were to be paid out of the money received from the sale of the property, which included the advertising. All the bills were received and paid except for advertising in the Georgetown Courier, which was not presented for payment until after all the funds in the hands of the commissioner had been expended, and the amount due Mr. McGill remains unpaid.

The Secretary of the Navy says the claim is just, the charges reasonable, and recommends the payment of the amount due.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BRIGHT. If the gentleman will withdraw that motion for the present I will renew it after a few more bills have been called.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I withdraw the motion.

PETER MEAGHER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4419) for the relief of Peter Meagher.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Peter Meagher, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $170, for labor performed in unloading coal from the schooners My Rover, Althea, and Jonathan May, and the bark David G. Wilson, at Long Key, Tortugas, Florida.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES G. HARRISON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4554) for the relief of James G. Harrison.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James G. Harrison, late assistant assessor in the second internal-revenue district of Indiana, the compensation payable to assessors in said district, from the 4th day of March, 1867, to the 14th day of April, 1869, during which time he acted as assessor, first deducting from the amount which would be due him as assessor the sums paid him as assistant assessor during the same period.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee of Claims, submitted the following report:

The petitioner, James G. Harrison, was assistant assessor of internal revenue for the second collection district of Indiana from the 1st day of September, 1862, to the 13th day of April, 1869; that during two years, one month, and nine days of that period, to wit, from the 4th day of March, 1867, to April 13, 1869, there being no assessor in and for said district, he, by the direction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and while assistant assessor of said district performed all the duties pertaining to the office of assessor of said district; that during the time he was acting assessor of said district he received only the compensation allowed by law to assistant assessors, to wit, $5 per day. He now asks the payment of such balance as will realize to him the full pay of an assessor for the period during which he discharged the duties of that office. A letter from the Fifth Auditor to a previous committee of this House, dated March 19, 1874, states that such balance is $1,555.90.

Your committee believe that the petitioner, having performed the duties of the office of assessor, should receive the full pay provided by law for the services he has rendered, and therefore report to the House the accompanying bill, and recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

J. M. DORSEY AND W. F. SHEPEARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 4555) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William F. Shepeard.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

Mr. EDEN. I object to this bill.

Mr. PAGE. Does it not require five objections, this bill having been objected to formerly?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed that the bill was objected to before.

Objection having been made, the bill was passed over.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BELL reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar and had directed him to report sundry bills and petitions with various recommendations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first cause to be read three bills which were reported by the Committee of the Whole on last Friday and were left unacted on by the House.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole with the recommendation that they do pass were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 796) for the relief of Jenkins A. Fitzgerald, assistant surgeon United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 4143) for the relief of John Adams, William B. Clift, David Dunseath, William Killinger, J. F. Scott, administrator of the estate of Obediah Scott, deceased, Davis C. Peak, Charles Linderman, James Linnane, Patrick Carey, John McMahon, and James Gorman, administrator of the estate of Patrick Gorman, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 1614) for the relief of S. T. Marshall, of Lee County, Iowa;

A bill (H. R. No. 3434) releasing the title to a certain cemetery lot to the city of Montgomery, Alabama;

A bill (H. R. No. 4007) for the relief of Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth United States Infantry, who lost his trousers and blanket by fire at Aiken, South Carolina;

A bill (H. R. No. 4290) for the relief of William L. Hansell & Sons;

A bill (H. R. No. 4418) for the relief of John D. McGill;

A bill (H. R. No. 4419) for the relief of Peter Meagher; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4554) for the relief of James G. Harrison.

Mr. FENN. I ask unanimous consent that for the joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) which has been reported from the Committee of the Whole there be substituted the Senate joint resolution, (S. No. 27,) which is identical in its language, and which is now on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution (S. No. 27) providing for transportation by the military authorities of John J. Manuel and two infant daughters from Camp Howard, Idaho Territory, to Saint Charles, Missouri, was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) was laid upon the table.

The following bills were reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments. The amendments were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended were engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Ella P. Murphy;

A bill (H. R. No. 1326) for the relief of Samuel B. Stauber and others;

The petition of H. H. Doty; and

The petition of Mrs. C. A. Von Cort.

Motions were made to reconsider the votes by which the above bills and petitions were laid on the table, and the motions to reconsider were laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock. I understand the House has ordered an evening session.

The SPEAKER. But the House has the power to adjourn.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. At half past four o'clock the House has to take a recess.

The SPEAKER. That was not the order of the House. The order of the House was that there should be an evening session at half past seven o'clock, but the House can sit until the very moment in the evening when that hour arrives.

The session for to-night is for reports from the Judiciary Committee for action. The Clerk will read the order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, that there be a session of the House to-morrow evening, commencing at half past seven o'clock, for the consideration exclusively of reports from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. That is an extract from the Journal of Thursday, and the order applies to to-night.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is pending, and the House has the matter within its power. It has a right to adjourn if it so desires.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania; and on a division there were—ayes 22, noes not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to report a substitute for the bill reported by the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of the Army, which I shall offer when that bill comes up for consideration. I ask that it be printed.

Mr. CONGER. Is the bill to be recommitted?

The SPEAKER. The object of the gentleman is that when the bill which he has had made a special order comes up he may offer this substitute. In other words, he gives notice that he will offer this as a substitute for that bill. The effect of what he asks is merely that the substitute may be printed, so that the House may understand it.

No objection was made; and the motion to print Mr. BANNING's substitute was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SAYLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 6167) to amend section 2990 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SAYLER moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CONGER. To what subject does this bill relate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer.

Mr. SAYLER. I introduced it in compliance with the petition that I have just received from Cincinnati, asking that some extension be given to their privilege as a port of entry.

Mr. CONGER. I think the title of the bill ought to state its purport.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ICE HARBOR AT CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Mr. SAYLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives the report of the board of engineers convened to report upon the subject of an ice harbor at Cincinnati, Ohio, together with an estimate of the probable cost of carrying out the plan proposed, and such other facts and recommendations as he may deem advisable.

Mr. SAYLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOTION TO ADJOURN.

Mr. COX, of New York. Have I a right to make a motion to adjourn now? For if not the time may be up before the recess.

The SPEAKER. The recess was not fixed for any particular hour; the order only provided that there was to be a session of the House at half past seven o'clock.

Mr. COX, of New York. I want to make a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That would cut off the night session.

Mr. COX, of New York. That is what I want.

Mr. CONGER. May I make one remark with regard to the order of business?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on the Judiciary in their investigations will after to-day be absent from the Capitol for some weeks, and the only time they can report is to-night, by the permission of the House. [Loud cries of "Regular Order!"]

Mr. CONGER. I have but a word further to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has listened as long as he dare.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. COX, of New York; and on a division there were ayes 12, noes not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.
